COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

Prospective Arrangements for the present Session: The Christmas Examination for Associateship and Fellowship will be held on the following dates, commencing at 10 a.m. each day—Tuesday, January 11, F.C.O., Paper work; Wednesday, January 12, F.C.O., Organ Playing, and A.C.O., Paper work; Thursday, January 13, A.C.O., Organ Playing. On Friday, January 14, the Diplomas will be distributed at the Neumeyer Hall, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, at 11 a.m. Candidates' names must be sent in on or before Wednesday, January 5 (full particulars may be obtained at the College); January 25, Lecture; February 22, March 22, Lecture; April 18, Annual College Dinner; May 24, Lecture: June 28, Lecture; July 12, 13, 14, Examinations; July 26, Annual General Meeting.

A COMPETITION for the MEADOWCROFT MEMORIAL PRIZE ANTHEM is hereby announced: the amount of the Prize to be Eight Guineas; the works sent in are to be full Anthems, and the words are to be selected from the Holy Scriptures or Book of Common Prayer.

The Anthem sent in should be short or of moderate length, taking about five or six minutes in performance, of such a character as would make the successful work suitable for parochial use, and likely to gain general acceptation as an effective piece, and withal not a difficult work to perform.

The MSS. must be sent in on or before March 1, 1887.

This competition is open to all composers.

A Prize of Eight Guineas is hereby offered for an Organ Composition suitable as a Postlude for Divine Service, occupying from about six to ten minutes in length.

Through the kindness and liberality of the Hon. Treasurer, M. E. Wesley, Esq., a Prize of Five Guineas is also offered for the best Prelude or Introductory Voluntary to occupy about four or five minutes in performance. MSS. for these competitions to be sent in on or before March 1, 1887.

Members of the College only are eligible to compete for the Prelude and Postlude Prizes.

Conditions will be sent on receipt of stamped envelope.
E. H. TURPIN, Hon. Secretary.

VERY IMPORTANT NOTICE
REGARDING THE
Collin-Mézin Violins and Violoncellos.

The Profession, Trade, and the public generally are cautioned against accepting as my make any Instrument not bearing my signature. All persons seeing such Instruments offered as mine would oblige me very much by informing me, and whoever may possess any said to be of my manufacture, though unsigned, should send them to me, stating where bought and the price paid. My Instruments are all very distinctly signed by my own hand, on the inside of the back, near the sound-post, in addition to the printed label bearing my name and address, the year of make, and my Trade Mark (label and signature patented), and this independently of other marks, dates, and initials, the authenticity of which can only be ascertained upon opening the instruments. COLLIN-MÉZIN.

NATIONALISM IN MUSIC.

THIS is an age of revived national feeling. On every hand we behold signs of a mighty movement of peoples towards a fuller appreciation of blood relationship, a common origin, and, as is fondly hoped, a common destiny. Than this the present age offers no more striking and remarkable phenomenon. Of late years, we have seen disunited Germany welded into a compact mass under one supreme headship, and now the Germans who acknowledge fidelity to Emperor William, with those who are under the sway of the Austrian Kaiser, anticipate a day when the last barrier that divides the Teutonic race shall be broken down. More impressive still are the circumstances of the Sclavonic nations, destined to play so great a part in the future of Europe. These are aflame with hope and astir with anxiety, fancying that the time is at hand when, if there do not arise an all-embracing Sclavonic empire, the "enslaved" sections of the race shall be free from a hated foreign yoke. In point of fact, every government of a mixed people has reason to know that nationalism is a growing force. Our own presents no exception to the rule, as the state of Ireland, and the just arising discontent of Wales and Scotland abundantly prove.

We may see in the great movement which will make famous the close of our century a natural reaction against the force that, in past days, dealt with races as with counters, and carved the land of nations heedless of the nations themselves. The reign of that particular kind of force is over. Civilisation will tolerate no more "conquerors," so called, and such a deed as the partition of Poland has become impossible. But there is much to be done by way of atonement for, and rectification of the past. This the power of opinion and the immense vitality of sentiment will doubtless accomplish in course of time; not always peacefully, perhaps, but, at least, effectually; states and dominions being determined less by the exigencies of international politics than by race.

We may expect that a revived national feeling will extend to whatever belongs to the nature of the peoples concerned. Take language, for example. The language of a nation has not been chosen and adopted by it—fitted on as a man fits on a suit of clothes. Having its origin in a common stock, it has, during many ages, been so moulded by the action of the national mind as to acquire a distinct individuality, possessing the characteristics of the nation itself. Those who have attempted to denationalise peoples have found the abolition of the language an impossible task. Before 1870, the Alsatian peasant vented his enthusiasm for France in the tongue of his German fathers, and to-day, the Polish speech may be heard under the guns of Russian garrisons. The cause of this tenacity is not far to seek, and is not wholly sentiment. Every man has in his native language something more than a familiar grammatical structure. He has that which is so closely interwoven with his habits and modes of thought as to be, in a sense, one with them and a part of himself. Reviving nationalism, therefore, must include language, though it may not display the excessive patriotism of Prince Bismarck, who declines to read books printed in other than the German character.

From time to time, arguments are laid before us tending to show that music differs from speech as regards the point just discussed. Superficially it does so. The written language of music is universal within the limits of what we call civilisation, and belongs as much to the Russian as the German, to the French as to the English. But he who, on this narrow basis, rests an assertion that there is no nationality in music, makes a great mistake. No nationality in music! Why the fact is absolutely and strongly the very opposite. Yet there must be some reason for so widespread a delusion, and for the superficial semblance of truth that propagates it. If we look into the matter, we find, first of all, the universal grammar and written character pointed out above, but there is also a degree in which the music of one people can be enjoyed by another. We English, for example, read the melodies of Spain or Poland as well as any one to the manner born, and are able to appreciate their beauty and the freshness which arises from unfamiliarity. Here we have, no doubt, a colourable justification for the dictum that our art is without nationality, and one that suffices for people who never trouble to look beneath the surface of things, as well as for expatriated Germans, who find it useful to preach a doctrine abroad which they steadily refuse to carry out at home. But of what avail are the considerations just indicated against solid facts which have their foundations deep down in human nature? By displaying those facts we shall show that music is necessarily and strongly national; also that it behoves each people, in the interest of the art generally, to cultivate music for themselves, after their own fashion.

Let us not forget, in the first place, that music existed before its language, and that the uniformity of its language in civilised countries is due, not to anything in the nature of the case, but to accident. We need not discuss the origin of music as an expression of feeling; it suffices to point out circumstances which inevitably tend to differentiate that expression, and sharply to distinguish the art of one nation from that of another. One such circumstance may be found in physical conditions. We should look, as a matter of course, for material differences between an inhabitant of the dark north, and one who dwells in the sunny south. We should expect to see in the first a grave and sombre man, in the other a gay and volatile being, harmonising with the brightness around him. The distinction, as everybody knows, actually exists. Indeed, save for a common humanity, there is no connecting link between, say, the Norwegian and the Neapolitan. The one, surrounded by a frowning and inhospitable nature with which he is always doing battle, cannot have the temperament, the feelings, the impulses of the other, who is constantly dandled on the lap of the "great mother" as her favoured child. As widely as the men differ must necessarily differ the expression of their feelings through the medium of music. This, too, is an actuality within the cognisance of most of us. Northerners ourselves, we know and understand the characteristics of northern strains—their deep and tender sentiment, their essential homeliness, their prevailing melancholy—a natural outcome of racial temperament begotten by physical conditions.* With these we are able to contrast rather than compare the gay strains of the South, their al fresco character, their vivacious rhythm, and almost uniform suggestiveness of a dance measure. Here, then, we have indubitable proof of a grand division in European music; not sharply defined, however, but passing by degrees, influenced by local conditions, from one extreme to the other. It would obviously be absurd to take Neapolitan music to Norway and say, "There is no nationality in music; adopt this as a better model than your own." As well might one take a palm from the Mediterranean shore and plant it on a rugged mountain side swept by winds from the icy Pole. The plant would die, and the melodies would take no root. That there are cases in which a tune belonging to one nation has been adopted by another is, no doubt, true. The "Dessauer" March, for example, though now German, is of Italian origin. But even here we find the force of nationalism at work. The Germans have Germanised the Italian tune. Apropos, Mr. Carl Engel remarks in his "Study of National Music": "A melody thus transplanted undergoes generally a gradual change, in conformity with the music of the nation by which it has been adopted. A curious instance of this occurred in Courland. Of a number of German songs translated into the Lettish language, and introduced into Courland by some gentlemen, a few became popular among the peasantry. After the lapse of a certain number of years, these songs exhibited a remarkable change: originally in major, they were now sung partly in minor, and a rude kind of accompaniment was added. Such adoptions are, however, on the whole, rare. They occur oftenest in a nation whose music has a less marked national character, and between nations whose music is not widely different in its characteristic features. Thus, the English will more easily adopt a foreign tune than the Germans, and they will more easily adopt a German tune than a Wallachian, while a genuine Javanese tune is not likely to take root among them, however favourably it may be introduced." We cite these remarks because they go to show the great vitality of the causes which differentiate the music of one nation from that of another—vitality which could have no stronger illustration than the fact that, in the rare cases where a foreign tune is adopted, it assimilates eventually to the national type.

* "The peculiar character of the popular music of a nation appears to be in great measure determined by the climate of the country, by the occupation and habits of the people, and even by the food upon which they principally subsist. The influence of climate is traceable, if we compare the tunes derived from different districts of a large

While the chief cause of national distinctiveness may be found in temperament and physical surroundings, other agencies act to the same end in a less degree. All peoples are not equally endowed with musical susceptibilities, nor with the power of imagination upon which the art so much depends. In other words, some nations, for reasons which cannot possibly be discovered, are far more musical than others. The Jewish race stands pre-eminent in this regard. Relatively to its number, it is infinitely more fertile of composers and artists than any other. But, as the Jews are a scattered people, without a nationality in the ordinary sense, they may here be left out of the question. Not so the Italians, who, for all their present degeneracy, are the musical nation, par excellence, in the sense that susceptibility to music, and love of it, exist with them as nowhere else. The reader can arrange the other European nations in what order he pleases, but he will hardly place them side by side as on an equality. All such difference in the measure of gifts must naturally influence national music in one way, by bringing it more or less under cultivation, and subjecting to the subtle action of advancing taste the sources of the art.

Other agencies of a subordinate character might be named; but, indeed, we recognise no need to demonstrate exhaustively the causes of a fact which is patent to every man who gives the matter a thought. It must be evident that, so far from there being no nationality in music, the universal art is made up of national sections, each distinguished from the rest by characteristic features having their origin in the nature and circumstances of the connected people. It is true that, in certain cases, the music of a nation overflows its boundaries, and becomes a general "classic," but to this point we shall speak presently.

The question now arises: How can the great fact of nationalism in music best be dealt with, so as to get the greatest profit out of it? Here, perhaps, we reach the main position of persons who speak of that fact with scorn, even when they have not the hardihood to deny it. It must be acknowledged that the position in question bears, at least, a semblance of strength, owing to a set of peculiar and, we might add, accidental circumstances. The wonderful succession of German masters, beginning with Bach and Handel and, so far, ending with Wagner, has given to Teutonic music a predominance with which we are all familiar, and the consequences of which must be obvious to the least reflective mind. No doubt, the influence of German music varies in different countries, according as they are affiliated to, or independent of the Teutonic race. Amongst ourselves it naturally prevails. We have sprung from the same stock as the modern Germans, and have preserved in our island home many of the national characteristics which may be seen in full force among the descendants of those who remained in the fatherland. German music comes to us, therefore, with a certain measure of adaptation to English nature. The case is different with the Latin peoples, whose national music is, for the most part, of a pronounced type, and whose feeling for the musical expression of an entirely different race, living under other conditions, can hardly spring from aught else than the promptings of curiosity or desire for knowledge. Hence, while admitting that Germany, by the exceeding gifts of her composers, has created the great classics of music, we should be careful not to admit that those classics are a standard for universal application. Some would have us do this, and impose upon the world as authoritative and binding a spirit and form which owe their origin to a single race. Reference to what has already been said shows that this is unphilosophical and impracticable, because each nation possesses and necessarily must retain, a spirit and form of its own, suited to its temperament and circumstances. Cases may be found in which individual musicians have denationalised themselves. Gluck, for example, wrote Italian music with the best of the composers native to the peninsula, and then won the applause of the French capital, but even he remained always sufficiently a German to warrant his own country in claiming him as an exponent of German art. But the conquest of one country's music by that of another has never yet been achieved, and we venture to say, never will be. The roots of national music, as already insisted upon, lie deep down in the nature of the people to whom it belongs, and can only be eradicated by destroying the nationality. It is useless, country. In mountainous Southern Germany, with its exhilarating air, the minor key is almost unknown, the triple time prevails, and the popular melodies are almost all capable of being harmonised with only the two common chords of the tonic and dominant. In flat Northern Germany, the minor key is less foreign, the common time occurs almost as frequently as the triple time, and the modulations are, on the whole, more complicated than those of the South. In countries where the people commonly drink wine the songs are more brisk and cheerful than in countries where beer is the favourite beverage." (Carl Engel, "Study of National Music.") therefore, to insist upon the claim of any "classics," to be regarded as a universal standard.

Even did the instance just referred to prove of avail, it would be distinctly unwise. Let us conceive the inconceivable, and take it that German music, pursuing, by means of its unquestionable might, a career of conquest, destroys the national art of its neighbours, and imposes itself. What must be the result? Assuming that the neighbours are not at the same time endowed with the German nature. The result must be the drying up of so many musical sources without making compensation by the substitution of others. We should have, in France, Italy, and the Sclavonic nations, hardly better than weak replicas of German works—things without the vitality which exists in every product of national life. Art would be infinitely the poorer for such a change—the poorer by all that makes attractive the illustrious schools of France and Italy, and that forms the groundwork upon which rest the soaring hopes of the great race farther east. The conclusion is that each country, recognising its own nature in its own music, should cultivate the art for itself, seize upon whatever is most distinctive and valuable in its own conception and expression, and endeavour to complete the edifice upon that best and surest foundation.

We may now pass on to consider how the matter affects ourselves. The position of we English is somewhat peculiar, and has led many to deny that we have a national music at all. Thus the late Henry F. Chorley wrote in his National Music of the World: "I find among the English tunes nothing in the least equivalent to Welsh or Irish or Scotch melodies, as regards freshness or strangeness. . . . The author of 'Tremaine' called us 'slow to move,' and thus long after one Shakespeare had put into the mouth of a certain Portia, a character in which there was more of Shakespeare's own intuition than the perception of the Italian heiress of Belmont, brilliant as she was. Speaking of the Englishman, says Shakespeare's Portia: 'I say nothing to him, for he understands not me, nor I him. He hath neither Latin, French, nor Italian. I think he bought his doublet in Italy, his round hose in France, his bonnet in Germany, and his behaviour everywhere.' There are many English tunes which may belong to nobody or to everybody. If the speculations which I have presented have any thread (so to say) on which, as so many entire and separate, yet not disparted beads, they can be strung, it is this: that nationality in music does not lie in either borrowing or adaptation, but in some inborn qualities, to be ascribed either to the influences of Nature or of manners, or of peculiar instruments, originated by rude people. There is small trace of anything of the kind in English music. I belong to the North, and know the good and sweet quality of our Lancashire voices, but where is the Lancashire tune? And where is the Cumberland tune? . . . Never, whether her head was high or low, has melody worn in this land of ours that distinct family face of her own which is to be found in Wales, Ireland, or Scotland." If it be true that we have no national music at all, or none worth calling so, our course is very clear. We do well to adopt that of the people nearest to us in blood, and work upon it as the next best. But is it true that we have nothing that can be called English? Surely it is not true, and we can back up this assertion by pretty strong evidence.

It is here noticeable that Mr. Chorley, from whom we have just quoted adversely, uses words on another page, which tend in an opposite direction! Referring to several of Arne's compositions, he speaks of them as "English words set to English music." Certain works by Bishop are described as owing little "save to English inspiration," and we further read of "the very great and English beauty of Bishop's music." This kind of casual admission that there is an English order of music may often be noticed coming from those who, were the question put to them point-blank, would answer in a very different sense. But we need not trouble ourselves much with the deliberate statements, or the unguarded concessions, of individuals. The actual facts are not difficult to make out, and thus we get evidence at first hand.

It must, of course, be conceded that we have no national music which, being made distinctive by peculiarities of structure, can instantly be recognised, like that of Scotland or Hungary. The peculiarly English element consists of features less obvious, but, we venture to think, not less real. Here some may interrupt: "Before we can judge of this, tell us what and where is your English national music." We answer that English national music of a typical sort may abundantly be found in the melodies of our folk-songs—those which have become a part of our life because in harmony with our temperament. The characteristics of those songs are sufficiently well marked for recognition and classification. The tunes are simply constructed, of a manly and straightforward character, emphasised by definite, well-marked rhythm and regularity of phrase; and they combine strength and tenderness to a degree approached by no other national airs, save the kindred German, in which, however, sentiment predominates over strength. All our really popular composers have "marked down" and appropriated these characteristics. Thus did Bishop, whose music everybody recognises as pre-eminently English; thus did Balfe, whose hold upon the people remains unshaken; thus did Dibdin and many others, unknown, perhaps, in the classic regions of their art, but enshrined in the memory and affections of the race. We have, therefore, a national style of melody, which has grown out of our own temperament and circumstances, and is the natural musical expression of our feelings. What are we to do with it?

At present we do little or nothing. Its influence may, no doubt, be seen in the effusions of people who make "songs to sell," though even there we find an excess of weak and flabby sentiment mistakenly supposed to be congenial to a strong and manful race. But, as far as we are aware, no efforts are made to infuse the English melodic spirit into works of higher culture.

Our studious youth are carefully taught to ignore the national spirit, and look upon the sturdiness and simplicity of English tune as far beneath their notice, much more their careful regard. Their interest is chiefly centred upon foreign models, and much of their labour is devoted to imitation of characteristics originating with alien peoples. Surely this is unphilosophical, although it must be admitted that its natural results are modified by the accident of predominance falling to the music of a kindred race. Observe that our objection is not aimed at those branches of the higher culture of music which involve form, treatment of themes, development, and so on. These are purely artificial and have no national basis. But we do contend for the wisdom and policy of utilising to the utmost whatever is distinctive and characteristic in our own music. Such a course promises the best results, not only to individuals, but as regards the creation amongst us of an English school, which shall be a product of English taste.

For the furtherance of the same end we would have the educational and executive departments of our music as far as possible in the hands of natives. It is all very well to cry down this proposition as an outcome of narrow prejudice, but we have shown good reason to thoughtful minds why the national spirit should be cultivated by establishing all our musical agencies on a basis with which that spirit accords. There is here no idea of protection to native talent at the general expense. That amounts to a very different thing with which we have no sympathy. Neither is there any question of preferring native incapacity to alien ability, which would be a foolish and suicidal course. But, taking a leaf from the book of our German friends, we would give the foreigner no chance against a native of equal gifts, and we would use up all our own talent for the purpose of making English music thoroughly homogeneous, root and branch. Such only is the true and practical course, seeing that nationalism in music is a great and important fact.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By Joseph Bennett.

No. XX.—GLINKA.

The present number of The Musical Times contains some remarks upon nationalism in music. With that article may fitly be associated the beginning of a sketch of Michel Ivanovitch Glinka, the most national of composers; the founder of a Russian school, and the initiator of an artistic development which may, and probably will, exercise an immense influence upon music in general. The materials of the sketch will be taken from Glinka's memoirs of himself; from M. Octave Fouque's admirable biographical study of the Russian composer, and from other trustworthy sources.

As a rule, Music draws her greatest sons out of the ranks of those in humble life. For a Haydn she goes to a village bailiff, for a Mozart, to the house of an obscure teacher of her own art, for a Beethoven, to the dwelling of a still more obscure singer in a Court chapel. "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called." Glinka was one of the exceptions. His family belonged to the Russian aristocracy, and had for generations been settled in the government of Smolensk. Some of the name were wealthy, as well as titled, and the brother of Madame Glinka was not only able, but disposed, to keep a band of musicians attached to his household. Glinka's father, however, had not an excess of worldly goods. The village of Novospasskoïe belonged to him, it is true, and he kept the state of a country gentleman in the midst of retainers and serfs. Nevertheless, the retired army captain was not a Crœsus, and, when he indulged in home festivities, the borrowing of his relative's orchestra always suggested itself as a needful measure of economy.

Michel Ivanovitch came into the world on May 20, 1804, at the village above named. He was a delicate child, nervously sensitive to the last degree, and often ailing. On account of this, perhaps, the future composer passed under the care of his paternal grandmother, an excellent old lady who nearly killed her charge with kindness, and, animated by the best intentions, did all she could to perpetuate his feeble health. The winds of heaven were not allowed to blow upon the precious child; the temperature of his room was regulated as though it were that of an orchid-house; beyond its walls young Michel was a moving bundle of furs; he had everything he cried for, and as he pretty often demanded confectionery his digestive organs were impaired with promptitude and despatch. Early training of this kind produces a hypocondriac, and Glinka's autobiography shows that such was the result in his case. It is curiously verbose on the question of health, and largely taken up with what Dr. So-and-so said and did, and how Dr. What's-his-name said and did something very different, with a consequence equally barren of good.

Young Glinka's sensitiveness quickly manifested itself as that of a musical nature. The singing of the church choir profoundly impressed him, and one of his childish amusements was the imitation of church bells upon brass basins which he arranged with some approach to a scale. But the boy's great delight came with his uncle's orchestra, when those musicians visited the lord of Novospasskoïe. On one occasion, Michel being then nine or ten years old, a clarinet quartet by Crusel was played with an effect which, for a time, completely dominated the boy's heart and intellect. It is said that he could think of nothing else, that he passed some days as in an ecstatic dream, and that, when his drawing-master reproached him with inattention, he exclaimed: "Music is my soul." The influence of his uncle's orchestra had another result—one much more lasting and important. It was the custom of an evening for two flutes, two clarinets, two horns, and two bassoons to perform Russian national airs and folk-melodies. The receptive nature of young Glinka thus became steeped in the character and colour of the beautiful tunes belonging to his native land, and thus, we may reasonably suppose, he received his first impulse toward a course afterwards pursued by him so far and with such good effect. Who of those about the lad could have guessed that, as the family musicians played the familiar strains, they were helping to create a composer destined to lay, upon the basis of his country's national music, the foundation of a national style, and place Russia on the road towards the front of recognised artistic nations? Yet so it was. The echoes of those performances in the mansion at Novospasskoïe will go down the "ringing grooves of time."

It was not to be expected that Michel Ivanovitch would keep his hands off the instruments. During the family festivities, the son of the house was more often in the orchestra than among the company, but happily, the father did not oppose his boy's preference. There was, of course, no thought of a musical career. After the manner of his class, young Glinka would go into the service of the State, and spend his life in the discharge of routine duties, relieved, perhaps, by a good deal of fiddling. With this end in view, he was taken to St. Petersburg, at the age of thirteen, and entered at the school for the children of the nobility. He resided at a pension, with three comrades, under the care of a governor, who seems to have encouraged rather than hindered the study of music. Be this as it may, young Glinka received permission to furnish his room with a grand pianoforte, upon which he made rapid progress. The boy was quick all round. He soon made himself master of Latin, French, German, English, and Persian, studied zoology and geography with ardour, and after a while was appointed a sub-teacher in arithmetic and algebra. Glinka left the St. Petersburg school at the age of eighteen, duly qualified to take service under government, but for this he was in no hurry. We next hear of him two years later, when the state of his health made advisable a resort to some sulphur baths in Circassia. He dilates largely in his memoirs upon this first journey south, where all nature assumed a new aspect to one brought up upon the uninteresting plains, and amid the forbidding physical conditions of Russia. At the close of his "cure"—which, by the way, was not a cure—Glinka returned to his father's place at Novospasskoïe. What he did there may best be told in his own words:—

"I resumed the study of music with new ardour. Twice a week we received friends, and on each occasion the orchestra played. I prepared these evenings in the following manner: I made each artist, with the exception of the best, rehearse apart till he had not one false or doubtful note. I could thus study from the beginning the methods of orchestral masters. Next I judged the general effect, myself directing the performance, violin in hand. When the piece ran smoothly, I stood aside and heard it at a distance. Here are the principal pieces in our répertoire: Among Overtures, 'Medea,' 'L'Hotellerie Portugaise,' 'Lodoïska,' 'Faniska,' and 'Les Deux Journées' of Cherubini (the first two were my favourites); 'Joseph,' 'Le Trésor Supposé,' and 'L'Irate' of Méhul; 'Don Giovanni,' 'Die Zauberflöte,' 'La Clemenza di Tito,' and 'Le Nozze di Figaro' of Mozart; 'Leonora' (in E) of Beethoven; among Symphonies, Haydn in B flat, Mozart in G minor, Beethoven in D. The overtures of Rossini were not yet played."

Well may the mouth of a young musician water as he thinks of this noble Russian lad, able thus to command the services of an orchestra, to whom—as no doubt the players were serfs—his slightest word was law. Glinka had a "good time" under the paternal roof, and felt, perhaps, that he could thus go on for ever. But it became necesssary to enter upon a career befitting his station, wherefore, in May, 1824, the young man, being then twenty years old, left his native village to take post as assistant secretary in the Ministry of Roads and Communications. We cannot imagine a more uncongenial place, as far as the work went, but happily there was not much of it. "The salary was good," says one biographer; "the labour slight, the responsibility nil." On these accounts, Glinka put up with his fate; doing so the more cheerfully because many of his fellow officials, and of the society into which he was thrown, were ardent musical amateurs, to say nothing of the fact that all the concerts and operatic performances of the capital were open to him. Having plenty of time on his hands, Glinka now began to study music under Carl Mayer, who, having measured the talent of his pupil, would accept no pay for services rendered. "You have too much ability," he said, "for me to go on acting as your professor. Come to me every day and we will make music together." Previously, however, Glinka had taken some lessons from John Field, of whom he writes in his Memoirs:—

"Although I did not hear him very often, I still remember (Glinka wrote at the age of fifty) his playing, which was at the same time gentle and strong, and marked by admirable precision. One might say, not that he struck the keys, but that his fingers fell upon them like great drops of rain spilt in pearls upon velvet. I do not share—and here I believe myself in agreement with all music-lovers who have heard Field—I do not share the opinion of Liszt, who one day said to me that he found the playing of this master to be 'sleepy.' No; Field's playing was not sleepy; on the contrary, it was often bold, capricious, unexpected. He simply took care not to let his art descend to the level of charlatanism; his ideal being very far from thrashing the keyboard, after the manner of pianists who are now the fashion."

Mayer exercised a good influence upon his friend and pupil. "He taught him," writes M. Fouque, "to distinguish the divers kinds of music, to prefer the true classics, and to interpret them correctly and simply, without exaggeration or affectation. Mayer was not a pedant, but an artist. This was why his pupil loved him so. An ordinary pedagogue could have done nothing with Glinka, who carried so far his horror of teaching and learning by routine as to give up studying harmony, under a former master, after receiving one lesson on intervals and their inversions. He composed, nevertheless, and Mayer agreed to be his guide. But at that time, he tells us, his theoretical notions were so vague that more often than not he took up his pen knowing neither where to begin, nor how to go on, nor where to end."

Glinka's musical labours, and his light duties at the Government office were, happily for him, not much disturbed by the events which attended the accession of the Emperor Nicholas. Every reader knows that those events comprised an insurrection in the capital, and its sanguinary suppression by a man not given to half-measures, when there was a question of having his own way. The educated youth of St. Petersburg were, as usual, well to the fore, not only in the streets, but on the road to Siberia. Often was Glinka reproached for not throwing in his lot with the cause which Nicholas stamped out—for the time. "You have no serious purpose," his friends would say, "you waste your time on unworthy frivolities." But the assistant-secretary was not to be caught. He showed himself at the office day by day; made music with Mayer as often as possible, and allowed revolutionaries and governments to fight out their quarrel as they thought best. All the same he had a terrible fright, concerning which we read in the Memoirs:—

"On the morning of December 14, we, that is to say, the son of our old sub-inspector at the pension, and myself, went out early. We walked towards the Winter Palace, and soon saw the Emperor come forth. The majestic and imposing figure of our sovereign remains deeply graven on my memory. I saw him that day for the first time. Pale, with a somewhat melancholy air, his arms crossed upon his breast, and walking slowly, he came towards the mob and said 'Children, children, disperse.' My friend and I remained some hours in the Place, and then, being hungry, I went to Bactourine's. Happily for my life or, at any rate, for my limbs, that I did so, for shortly afterwards the sound of musketry was heard. Somewhat later, the cannon spoke."

"A few days passed and then, in the middle of the night, some one knocked at my door. I opened it to Colonel Varenzof, a staff-officer attached to my department, who, in a tone admitting of no reply, ordered me to follow him immediately to his Highness's house."

"Imagine the stupor of a man scarcely awake, and not knowing of what he was charged. Fancy that among the insurgents were men with whom I had been very intimate. I experienced then, though for a very short time, the sensation of fear. My heart was frozen; my spirit dropped down to my toe-nails. I dressed quickly, and, on the road to the residence of the Duke of Wurtemburg, brother of the Empress, I begged the Colonel to tell me of what I was accused. He reassured me in a word: Kuchelbecker, a former governor, was mixed up with the conspiracy. Two of his nephews, who were my relatives, had fled. The police were after them, and desired assurance that they were not hidden in my house. Introduced to the presence of his Highness, I calmly explained in French, of which language I had great command, that my cousins, sons of a gentleman-of-the-chamber to the Grand Duke, and educated at Government cost were well-disposed young men. He heard me favourably and dismissed me."

No more than thus slightly and indirectly was Glinka ever involved in the domestic troubles of his native land.

Having composed many Romances, and such like, for the piano, our hero was now to essay a more ambitious flight. Amateur musical and dramatic performances were then much in vogue at the houses of the Russian nobility, and when on a visit to General Apoukhtïne, near Smolensk, Glinka wrote a

Cantata, having the accession of Nicholas as its subject. In the performance of this he took the part of Genius, wings on shoulders and torch in hand. With regard to the music we read in the Memoirs:—"The music was truly dramatic; that is to say it exactly fitted the sense of the words." The young Russian's success as composer and artist in this piece may have had something to do with his next important step—resignation of the post under government. At any rate, command of his entire time enabled the young noble to enter fully into the artistic diversions of society. What these were may best be gathered from his own account:—

"At the end of August, 1828, Galitzin (afterwards well known in London), Tolstoï, other young men, and myself conceived the idea of giving a public serenade upon the water. We took two vessels, and illuminated them with Venetian lanterns. In one were the organisers of the fête; in the other the trumpets of the Chevalier Guards. On the poop of the first was a piano, with the aid of which I accompanied and directed the chorus. I recall the excellent effect produced by Tolstoï's tenor voice in the Romances. The chorus 'Sonnez, sonnez,' from Boieldieu's 'La Dame Blanche,' was very well executed. After each piece the second vessel burst into fanfares. Instruments with keys and pistons had not yet been invented, and the ear did not suffer the false and discordant sounds which now irritate. A mazurka of Count Wielhorski, written specially for trumpets, made a strong impression upon me. Later on I composed the Slavsia in "Life for the Czar," for plain trumpets, and if it were possible to-day to form an orchestra like that which took part in our serenades, it is certain that that Finale would have a great effect."

"The Abeille du Nord spoke of our serenade, and this success tempted us to go on. We soon gave a representation to Prince Kotchonbey, President of the Council of the Empire. We were sixteen young fellows, and we had an orchestra, with Mayer at the piano. Dressed as a woman, I played Donna Anna in a translation of Mozart's 'Don Giovanni'; then I improvised at the pianoforte."

"We gave another performance at the Palace of Tsarsko-Sélo. A serenade of mine was sung, also some couplets, with chorus, which I had composed to words by Galitzin. Ivanof sang the couplets; the chorus was confided to the choir of the Imperial Chapel, of which Ivanof himself was a member."

"From there we went to Marino, in the government of Novgorod the Great, two hundred versts from St. Petersburg. At the house of Princess Stroganoff I played Figaro in 'The Barber of Seville.'"

A pleasant picture of Russian cultured life is here revealed. It may be doubted whether in any other country at that time—certainly not in England—young patricians were found giving themselves up to artistic endeavour in the fashion of Glinka and his fellows.

Our composer now had a desire to travel, and especially to visit Italy. This his father, ordinarily so gracious, forbade with firmness, till a convenient medical man discovered "a quadrille of diseases dancing in his body," and ordered him at once to seek a warmer climate. The paternal interdict was forthwith removed, and Glinka, accompanied by the tenor, Ivanof, set out (April 25, 1830) for the "land of song." The travellers made straight for Milan, where Glinka, enchanted with all he saw, fell into a state of chronic enthusiasm. He speaks rapturously in his Memoirs of the magnificent Cathedral, the purity of the heavens, the black eyes of the ladies, and the elegance of their costume. He, in turn, soon became a persona grata with society in the Lombardian capital. He made many friends, especially among the fair sex, and it is a suggestive fact that he gave up, at this time, his habit of dedicating compositions to individuals, which "gave rise to tittle-tattle and caused jealousies." He composed a good deal, by the way, but mostly confined himself to working up into fantasies, serenades, and such like the melodies of Rossini, Donizetti, &c. During Glinka's stay in Milan "La Sonnambula" was produced at the Scala, with an effect which the Russian describes:—

"This work, awaited with impatience, produced, despite its faults, a prodigious effect. Towards the last Pasta and Rubini, who played the leading parts, sang with veritable enthusiasm in their desire to support Bellini, whom they preferred before all. In the touching Finale of the second act they really wept. It was indeed a singular experience to see, in full Carnival, everybody breaking down and crying, on the stage and all over the house. I had a place in the Russian Ambassador's box, where my compatriots and myself shed a reasonable quantity of tears."

Glinka began taking lessons in counterpoint at Milan, under Professor Basili, while his friend Ivanof studied singing under Bianchi. But the young noble found routine work as difficult and uncongenial as ever. He could see nothing satisfactory in poring over the rules which Basili considered as the essence of musical life, and it is to be feared that master and pupil did not get on very well together. In October, 1831, Glinka was at Naples, whence, leaving Ivanof to take lessons from Nozzari, he returned to the North of Italy, and resumed his gay Milan life, ultimately travelling to Berlin for the purpose of visiting his married sister. He has himself summed up the results of his Italian trip:—

"I was often ill, but I had also much enjoyment, and received many poetic impressions in that land. My frequent intercourse with the singers of the first and second order, as well as with excellent amateurs, give me an insight into the practical details of the vocal art. I learned to write well for the voice in hearing Nozzari and Madame Fodar—artists who advanced singing to the highest degree of perfection. . . . As for my attempts at composition during this period, I fancy that they were bad enough. I made useful reflections upon that branch of my art, but the works I wrote to please my Milanese friends—they were very obligingly published by Ricordi—served to show me that I had not found my line, and that I could never be sincerely Italian. Home sickness forced upon me, little by little, the idea of composing Russian music."

Upon the sentence last quoted, M. Fouque makes some very appropriate remarks: "In effect, it is from this time that we see him tormented by the thought of creating a national school of music for his own country. Strange law of contrast! It is at Milan, under a sky so different from his own, in face of nature with a foreign aspect, before the monuments of an alien civilisation, surrounded by Italians, who, however, were fond of him—it is there that he feels Russia in his inmost soul, and is a Northerner to the very marrow."

On his way to Berlin, Glinka passed through Vienna, heard Strauss's orchestra, and wrote a Cracovienne under the force of its inspiration. On reaching the Prussian capital, he put himself under Dehu for harmony and counterpoint. But the national music of Russia was more to him than exercises. It haunted him day by day.

DR. A. C. MACKENZIE ON "THE ASPECTS AND PROSPECTS OF MUSIC IN ENGLAND."

ON the 15th ult. Dr. A. C. Mackenzie visited Manchester for the purpose of distributing the prizes won by successful competitors at the examinations instituted by the National Society of Professional Musicians. On such occasions it is usual for the distributor to address the assembled company, a fact which Dr. Mackenzie turned to account by preparing and reading an important paper on "The Aspects and Prospects of Music in England." Through his favour we are enabled to lay before our readers its leading passages, which, we feel sure, will be perused with interest.

After a few introductory remarks, Dr. Mackenzie laid down this proposition:—

"It is impossible to know anything of English, Italian, French, and German music during the last two centuries, and to assert that in this respect England compares as favourably with Italy, France, and Germany as it does in politics, commerce, literature, and science."

But this was not always the case, and the speaker went on to show cause:—

"The cause of the eclipse under which music has been so long in this country is, no doubt, that the thoughts of the nation were too exclusively directed to commercial pursuits, that a kind of narrow utilitarianism was to an undue degree predominant. Thus music came to be looked upon as a frivolous pastime, unworthy the serious attention of grave men, unworthy, too, the support of the State. It became a mere fancy article, which was valued only in so far as it was exotic and costly. That is to say, it was valued so by the classes that are called Society; the middle and lower classes never quite turned their backs on their national music. They, indeed, preserved it from perishing; they kept the spark alive, and transmitted it to the present generation. Under these circumstances, however, our native music could flourish—if I may speak of flourishing at all—only in the inferior branches of secular music, and in the restricted forms of sacred music which the Church then allowed."

The "eclipse," however, is passing away. As regards composers, for example, Dr. Mackenzie contended that we can now "hold our own against continental nations." His words on this point will be read with interest and pleasure by patriotic Britons:—

"I doubt very much whether Italy, France, or Germany have, at this time, men beside whom, to mention only a few names, our Sullivan, Parry, Cowen, Prout, Corder, Stanford, and Thomas would look small. Nay, I would go farther and say that, excepting Verdi, Gounod, and Brahms, of whom only the last may be said to be in full activity, the Englishmen named by me are the peers, if not more than the peers, of their musical contemporaries in other countries. Our public is now throwing off its distrust of native music, and the coldness which was shown to native composers is rapidly giving way to a strong desire to welcome every honest effort. This is as it should be. Many notable works have been penned by hardworking, ill-requited, and often even entirely unrewarded, composers, and till recently but few opportunities presented themselves for bringing them to a hearing. Indeed, it is a matter of fact that not so very long ago the Sydenham Crystal Palace concert-room was almost the only one in which a young orchestral composer could try his wings and expect a welcome from the conductor, who on this account alone deserves to be remembered. We were extremely cautious not to exhibit too much enthusiasm towards music of home growth. This attitude is a very effective preventive against self-satisfaction and conceit—vices entirely foreign to the musician's nature, I hope—but there is such a thing as over cautiousness."

The speaker went on to argue that there is still need for more generous appreciation. The public must "keep pace with the musician and listen to his work," while both public and critics should be tolerant in regard of a composer's individuality:—

"In this connection I may, perhaps, be permitted to urge a plea for tolerance—namely, that public and critics should allow every composer, who has learned the use of his tools, full liberty in the choice of his style; that, instead of attempting to force upon him the adoption of a cut and dried mode of expression, however excellent, they should endeavour to understand and to familiarise themselves with the language which he feels to be his own. In saying this, I have, of course, no intention of laying it down as an axiom that a musician ought not to listen to well-meant, well-considered advice. I only wish to warn against the stifling of artistic individuality by a tyrannical imposition of a favourite system."

Going on to show that besides the generosity thus pleaded for, much remains to be desired for the good of our music, Dr. Mackenzie stated three weighty and discouraging facts:—

"First, there is not in any English town, not even in London, a permanent English Opera Company, although of the making of operetta companies there is no end."

"Secondly, there are but few of our most populous cities which can boast a standing orchestra, or even are able to form out of their own resources a quite satisfactory temporary one."

"Thirdly, in the wealthiest country in the world, little, next to nothing, is done by the State or municipalities to foster music, the most popular art of the day, and one of the most powerful factors in the formation of character and manners."

These general statements had, of course, to be supported by details, of which Dr. Mackenzie had good store. Referring to State subsidy of music, he showed that its limit is a grant of £500 to the Royal Academy in London, £300 to the Royal Irish Academy, and a small capitation grant to elementary schools, which are inspected for music by three professors at an annual cost of £600. With this state of things the speaker contrasted that which obtains in France, where the Paris Conservatoire alone takes £10,000 yearly out of the national purse, and where the municipalities liberally follow the example of the central government. Italy, though much poorer than France, is not less ready to spend money upon music, and, as for Germany—

"Germany would not be in music what she is to-day without her Princes, great and small, and their Court theatres, Court orchestras, Court composers, and virtuosos. The town councils of that country do not, however, leave all to the Princes and the State. Only a few weeks ago there was opened at Halle, a theatre which this town of 71,000 inhabitants built at a cost of £59,390. And this municipal zeal is by no means confined to theatres, but extends to music schools, &c. Many towns have their 'town music-directors and town orchestras,' the members of which have fixed salaries. Municipalities contribute sometimes to the pension funds of the members of their orchestras. The town council of Leipzig distinguishes itself by the interest it takes in matters musical. Cologne, too, does much for the art. Frankfort and other towns might likewise be instanced. Now I have never heard it argued that the great interest which is taken by the German nation in music has ever blunted its keenness for business or hindered its commercial prosperity."

After an interesting description of the functions not long ago discharged in Germany by the "licensed purveyor of music in the Principality or Dukedom," Dr. Mackenzie went on to describe his own experience when under the authority of such an official:—

"The other young inmates of our house were apprenticed and legally bound—which, by the way, I was not—for a certain number of years to my friend, and in return for their board and instruction had, as I have already stated, to take their places in the band when they were considered sufficiently capable. This orchestra was sent out, much after the manner of a confectioner's supper in boxes, wherever and whenever required. The rules of the old German guilds were rigidly observed; from the status of an apprentice the incipient musician passed to the higher grade of a journeyman—by which he acquired the privilege of carrying a walking-stick and the unenviable honour of being allowed to wear a stove-pipe hat—and from the high grade of a journeyman he rose in due time to the exalted rank of a master. He was then at liberty to seek his fortune elsewhere. Time does not permit me to describe the workings or the results of this curious system, but I must tell you that during the hours of morning practice our house became a tolerably close imitation of the tower of Babel, if your imagination can substitute the sounds of different musical instruments for the clatter of tongues. There were violinists in the bedrooms, studying their "Kreutzer," and seemingly indifferent to the gurgling groans emerging from one or more double-basses next door to them. A clarinet shared the wash-house with a trumpet, and I have, in summer time, seen every available corner of the little garden occupied by the busy players. The favourite resort of the trombone player happened to be the wood-cellar; there, in its cool depths, he snorted or made dismal melody to his heart's content. I can hear him now. In short, from attic to basement the house resounded with the tones of different instruments, in all sorts of keys, and was possibly unrivalled as a school wherein to learn the mysteries of instrumentation."

After this amusing digression, Dr. Mackenzie brought his hearers back to the state of things in England, and placed them very near the pith of the matter when he said:—

"But art is not business, and if you make a business of it the result is disastrous. Here we touch, indeed, on the sore from which our musical life is suffering—the cultivation of music on business principles. It would be affectation to affirm that art or art institutions can flourish without the assistance of careful business management, but business should be the means, not the end. Of the many noble exceptions I am, of course, aware; they are, indeed, so obvious that I hardly need to point them out. Who is not reminded in this connection of the great English Festivals, which present the great works of the masters to the public in a manner hardly possible under ordinary conditions, and encourage the art by affording our composers opportunities for the production of their vocal and instrumental works on the most liberal scale? These gatherings are becoming year by year more national in their character, and we owe a debt of gratitude to the men who devote so much of their time to their management. Our unsurpassed choral bodies, certain concert societies in this and that town, do much; and the City of London has, by founding its great Guildhall School of Music, shown an amount of goodwill towards the art redounding greatly to its honour, and set an example to other towns worthy of speedy imitation. What I have to complain of is, that the exceptions are not the rule, or, should this complaint be unreasonable, that the exceptions are not more numerous."

As to the present and most urgent needs of music in England, Dr. Mackenzie told his hearers that we want, first, a national opera, which might be established, in default of State aid, by personal guarantee. He believed that, in a little while, such an opera would pay its way. To this end, however, there must be a modest beginning:—"A house modelled on the scale of the town theatres of Germany, or the Parisian Opéra Comique, will do very well, especially if the public be disposed to discountenance the so-called 'star performances,' which are the ruin of musical enterprise in England." Anticipating success for such an institution, the speaker interjected a caution against pushing national sentiment too far:—

"And here I would advise you to keep patriotism within the bounds of reason. By all means, let us see that our countrymen get fair play; they certainly did not get it in the past. Nay, let us even give them the preference when we have to choose between foreigners and natives of equal talent and attainments; but let us not favour an inferior man simply because he is our countryman. Whatever is excellent ought to be welcome wherever it may hail from. In art nothing but free trade can lead to prosperity and progress. No protection, no monopolies!—whether they protect or monopolise foreign or native productions, they are an evil."

Our second requirement, according to Dr. Mackenzie, is "more concert institutions whose object it is to bring to a hearing the best symphonic and choral compositions, native as well as foreign." This naturally brought the lecturer to the question of orchestras—perhaps the most important of all at this phase of our national musical life:—

"There should be a good orchestra in every town of over 100,000 inhabitants. The influence which such an orchestra would bring to bear upon the musical taste of the population is incalculable. To expect in the near future much help from our municipal authorities would be unwise, but the time will surely come when they must give ear to the voice of the people and open the treasury for the purpose of helping to increase the number of good performances, and, what is equally important, reduce the cost to the listener. In the meantime, we must trust to the exertions and the liberality of lovers of music. By the adoption of the system of guarantors, especially if it be carried out on a sufficiently large scale, much might be accomplished."

After declaring that "music is too dear in England," Dr. Mackenzie had a word to say about English conductors:—

"So long as I can remember, I have heard the catch-cry 'we have no English conductors,' and such cackle is easy to join in. Think of the coolness, acquired only by constant practice, the many little individualities which gradually develop—and an orchestra, by constantly playing under one director, first begins to notice, follow, and at last actually to feel—which go to make up the perfect conductor. He ought to possess the combined qualifications which characterised the faithful servants of the fortunate prince in fairy-tale, called Long-sight, Quick-ear, and Eat-all. He must see everything, hear everything and, before rehearsal, have mentally digested everything. Now let me ask whether Englishmen have ever been afforded, in the past, many chances of attaining even the requisite freedom from nervousness, to say nothing of the other qualifications requisite for the use of the bâton; as difficult an instrument as any in the orchestra? I think not, and again repeat that the absence of orchestras accounts for it all."

Our third great want was defined by Dr. Mackenzie as "musical education within the reach of all." This led him to a glance at the various institutions now existing, and to say that not their quality, but their number, is at fault. They are capital, but too few—like the English infantry:—

"Cheap musical education must give a great impulse to the study of the art, and would, before long, furnish the requisite supply of singers, players, composers for the opera houses and concert rooms, and might possibly be mainly instrumental in bringing home to us the expedience of founding the very institutions discussed by me. It is not necessarily certain that each individual pupil will adopt the musical profession as a means of livelihood; many amateurs will gladly study the theory of music, or one or more instruments, for the sake of the pleasure they derive from the practice of the art."

In his peroration the speaker said:—

"On the whole, the prospect seems a pleasant and hopeful one. In spite of the existing deficiencies and difficulties, which I have not hesitated to point out frankly, we have right good reason to be grateful for the steady onward march of progress. The interest of the public in good music generally, and in native music particularly, is increasing, and consequently a widening field lies open for the exercise of the talent of which there is no lack in this country."

A hearty eulogium upon the Society of Professional Musicians followed, after which Dr. Mackenzie gave his last words to the students:—

"Study music for its own sake, not for vanity's or profit's sake. Only thus will you be able to apprehend its beauties, only thus will it become a joy and a comfort. Remember also that the art to whom you owe allegiance has a perfect right to claim all your affections and attentions, and to say to you with Florimel in the old comedy:—'I would have a lover that if need be should hang himself, break his neck, poison himself for very despair. He that will scruple to do this is an impudent fellow if he says he is in love.'"

We have made liberal quotations from Dr. Mackenzie's address, but feel sure that no apology need be offered to those who consider the eminence of the speaker, the opportunities he has had of comparing our musical state with that of other countries, and the moderate and sensible expression of his views.

THE WEBER CENTENARY.

"There never lived a more truly German musician than thou! Wherever thy genius led thee, into whatever far-off region of Fancy; with all its countless, delicate fibres, it remained rooted within the great heart of the German people, with whom thou couldst laugh and weep like unto a guileless child when it listens to the traditional stories of a wondrous past. Nay, it was this very preservation of thy child-like nature that guarded thy manhood with an angel's care, and caused the manifestations of thy genius to be ever chaste and pure." "And, behold, now the Briton renders justice unto thy genius, the Frenchman admires thee, but only the German can love thee. Thou art his, a beautiful day out of his life, a warm drop of his blood, a distinct part of his very heart." It was the successor of Carl Maria von Weber in the Conductor's chair at the Dresden Hof-Theater, Richard Wagner, who spoke these words at the open grave which was to receive the mortal remains of the composer of "Der Freischütz," after their transference from this country to the Saxon capital, in 1844. They are the words of a poet, dictated by genuine enthusiasm. Nor do they contain aught to be attributed to the exercise of the proverbial "poetic license" frequently indulged in on similar occasions. The successor, in a far wider sense than that appertaining to his short-lived official capacity at Dresden, of Weber, was merely giving an artistically-finished utterance to the sentiments pervading the entire nation, from the Spree to the Danube. But a people's memory in regard to the men who have helped in the building up of its greatness is not, as a rule, very enduring. New men of genius arise to perpetuate and elaborate the creative ideas initiated by the departed one, and in the dazzling splendour of present achievements the splendid services rendered by the master minds of the preceding generation are, for a time at least, obscured. In the case of Weber, the forty-two years which have elapsed since the above noble tribute was paid to his memory have sufficed to render the celebration in his native country of the centenary of his birth a very lukewarm affair indeed. Up to the time of writing, but few accounts had reached us of the actual festivities held in the Fatherland in honour of the auspicious event which occurred on the 18th ult. We were, however, fully apprised of the preparations made for the purpose in various German towns, including the performance, honoris causâ, of a "cyclus" of the composer's recognised operatic works at the leading lyrical theatres (nearly all of them State-subsidised institutions), a few revivals of his choral and chamber works in the concert room, the usual number of commemorative articles in the organs of the Press—et voilá tout. Eutin, the pleasantly situated little town in Holstein, which emerged from its obscurity through the accident of the birth there of one of Germany's greatest composers, has striven hard to give a national complexion to its intended festivities, but it has failed in its efforts, and an almost purely local celebration of the event is all it has been able to muster under the circumstances. It was hoped, indeed, that the Eutin commemoration would be specially graced by the ceremony of unveiling a statue of its greatest son in the vicinity of the humble dwelling where the composer first saw the light, but the execution of the scheme, owing to insufficiency of funds, had to be indefinitely postponed. Subscription lists for this purpose were opened some two years since, and although most liberally supported in a few individual instances, the Eutin Weber Monument Fund, according to the recently published report of the committee, has, as yet, only reached the sum of some 16,000 marks (£800), or about one-fourth of the amount required in order to worthily carry out so laudable a project. The fact throws a significant light upon the prevailing enthusiasm among the German people in regard to the "most truly German musician that ever lived." Statues of men more or less distinguished abound in the Fatherland. A monument to the recently deceased Franz Abt, the popular and pleasing, albeit somewhat shallow German songster, is already in course of execution. There is some hope, therefore, that the present jubilee year of the birth of Carl Maria von Weber will not be allowed to expire before his native town has been adorned with a noble bronze effigy of the manly singer of "Lyre and Sword," and of the ever truly popular melodies of "Der Freischütz."

It would be incorrect, however, to infer from the above facts and figures that the memorable words spoken by Richard Wagner, and quoted at the outset of these remarks, were no longer applicable to the people whose heartfelt sentiments they echoed at the time of their delivery. Important, and even vital changes have passed over Germany since then. A non-political, though temporarily united nation at the time when the stirring songs of "Leyer und Schwert" were written; a nation of thinkers, devoted to the cultivation of the arts and sciences at a plurality of Royal and Grand Ducal residences when "Freischütz" and "Euryanthe" were first produced; Germany, hitherto in fact little more than a "geographical expression," has since merged into a consolidated and formidable empire. A nation thus welded into a whole, and proportionally elevated in the political scale, has many onerous burdens to bear, and is not always prepared to loosen its purse strings, and render ostentatious homage to the shades of its great men at a given period. Every truly creative artist, moreover, erects his own enduring monument in his works. Let us glance along the list of operatic composers contemporary with Weber, and who shall ignore the fact of the evergreen freshness of "Preciosa," "Freischütz," "Euryanthe," and "Oberon" becoming apparent whenever a revival of these masterpieces is deemed expedient by operatic managers, while such undoubtedly noble works as Spohr's "Faust" and "Jessonda," Spontini's "La Vestale" and "Olympia," together with Meyerbeer's (the fellow pupil of Weber with Abbé Vogler, at Darmstadt) hybrid operatic productions, and those of a host of their imitators are being consigned to oblivion as a mere phase, not the essence, of an epoch in the progress of the musical drama. Nor are the Germans altogether oblivious of the debt of gratitude they owe to the founder of their truly national opera. A labour of love, and infinite, painstaking care such as F. W. Jähns's "Thematic and Chronological Index to the works of C. M. von Weber" (a supplementary volume to which is now in course of preparation), constitutes in itself a monument more worthy of its object than even the statue erected long since at the Theaterplatz, of Dresden. On the other hand, Dr. Langhans, in his recently completed "History of Music in the 17th, 18th, and 19th Centuries," concludes his sympathetic account of the career of our composer with these remarks: "With Weber, a dramatic composer had passed away from our midst, than whom Germany had possessed none greater since the days of Mozart. If, in comparison with his efforts in the musical drama, his compositions for the church, and, with the exception of his setting to Körner's 'Lyre and Sword,' his detached songs also, are likely to command but a minor interest, the service rendered by him to instrumental music has scarcely been less important than that achieved in the field of the drama. Irrespective of the overtures to his three principal operas, and of the 'Jubel Overture'—those enduring ornaments of orchestral literature—he has enriched our chamber music in manifold ways, while, as an eminent virtuoso of the pianoforte, his compositions for that instrument have been as epoch-making as were those of Spohr for the violin. . . . An enormous advance was made by him in the technique of pianoforte playing, while he initiated a new style in his compositions for that instrument, combining brilliancy with the charm of an expressive melodiousness. In this direction, too, Weber may be numbered amongst the most important successors of Mozart." It is by consulting such authorities, and not by the noisy popular demonstrations of an ephemeral enthusiasm, that the pulse of a nation may be felt, and the real measure be obtained of its gratitude towards one of its great departed.

Our readers are doubtless familiar with the story of Weber's life—a story of struggles and disappointments, of an unbounded faith in his own genius, and in the sacredness of his art; of the eventual triumph of that art over prejudice and petty intrigues; a story, too, of sickness, and premature death in this country, far away from those whom he loved best, and with whom he to the last moment so fervently longed to be once more united in the flesh. The career of our composer has been ably and exhaustively depicted by his son, Max Maria von Weber, in his "Life of Weber" (translated into English by Mr. Palgrave Simpson); an interesting monograph on the same subject being likewise extant, from the pen of Weber's distinguished pupil, the late Sir Julius Benedict. We may also refer the readers of The Musical Times to a short essay on Weber, which appeared in the columns of this journal in the October and November numbers of 1875. Whatever the degree of popularity enjoyed by the composer of "Der Freischütz" in this country may be at the present moment, there can be no doubt as to its altogether phenomenal extent during his lifetime. There are those still living amongst us who witnessed the veritable furore created by that operatic masterpiece upon its first production (no matter with what alterations, additions, and general adulterations characteristic of the period) in London, on July 22, 1824, at the Lyceum, then, under the name of the English Opera House, managed by Arnold and musically directed by Hawes, who had acquired the use of the score from the composer. The more important stages of Covent Garden and Drury Lane soon followed with their version of the popular operatic attraction, and for many months after, extending far into the following year, 1825, a "Freischütz" of some sort or other constituted, with but few interruptions, the nightly attraction at some seven theatres in the Metropolis. It is true that the spell thus exercised over the minds of playgoers may have been largely owing, in the first instance, to the diablerie perpetrated in the famous scene of the "Wolf's glen," the horrors of which, as presented both at the English Opera House and at Covent Garden, are graphically described in contemporary reports, and have been made the most of by the fantastic pencil of George Cruickshank. Indeed, we can form an exaggerated idea of the realism of its details from the ghastly "Blocksberg Scene" and "The Witches' Kitchen," in the version of Goethe's "Faust" now being presented to overflowing audiences by the present manager of the Lyceum. But, the diablerie apart, the wondrously suggestive, and nobly romantic music of Weber worked its way in edgeways; number after number, previously curtailed or altogether omitted, was reinstated in its integrity, and thus "Der Freischütz" became the pioneer of a resuscitated taste for serious opera in this country. In justification of this remark, and, as an illustration of the prevailing tendency of English opera-goers at the time, we may be permitted to quote a few lines from the "Recollections and Reflections" of the late Mr. Planché, the author of the libretto of "Oberon." "Such," says the writer referred to, "was the state of music in England forty-six years ago (in 1826), that when, in conjunction with Bishop, I had made an attempt in my second opera, 'Cortez' (produced in 1823), to introduce concerted pieces and a Finale to the second act more in accordance with true operatic construction, it had proved, in spite of all the charm of Bishop's melody, a signal failure. Ballads, duets, choruses, and glees, provided they occupied no more than the fewest number of minutes possible, were all that the play-going public of that day would endure. A dramatic situation in music was 'caviare to the general,' and inevitably received with cries of 'cut it short!' from the gallery, and obstinate coughing or other significant signs of impatience from the pit." Yet Bishop himself was one of the leading offenders in pandering to the deplorable taste of both gallery and pit as here described.

Notwithstanding, however, the reformatory influence exercised by Weber's "Freischütz" upon the English lyrical drama for many years after the above events—notably in the third decade of our century, when alternate German companies presented the work in its native garb—the high-going waves of popular enthusiasm had already, in a great measure, expended their impetus by the time the great master arrived in London for the purpose of conducting a series of performances of his new opera (which proved to be the last), viz., "Oberon," at Covent Garden Theatre, for which the work had been specially written, and the first performance of which took place on the 12th of April, 1826. Space does not permit us to enter in detail upon the reasons for this abatement in popular enthusiasm. Suffice it to say that the above date, like that of the first performance of the composer's two preceding operatic works, marks a distinct epoch in the progress of the musical drama, and England may be justly proud of having lent wings to the dying genius of one of the greatest dramatic composers the world has ever seen. The following description by an eye-witness of the personality of the master, and of his reception on the occasion of his first appearance before an English public, may not inaptly conclude these necessarily brief and cursory observations concerning an epoch in art-history closely connected with our own modern musical development as a nation, and with regard to which many an important chapter remains as yet unwritten. "The great novelty," says the writer in question, dating his report March 12, 1826, "of these musical entertainments (Oratorio Concerts, Covent Garden) has been the appearance of the celebrated Carl Maria von Weber, who is arrived in London on a visit to Sir G. Smart. On Wednesday a crowded audience assembled to see this popular composer, it being understood that he was to preside during the first part of the Oratorio. At an early hour the boxes were well filled, and every seat in the pit was occupied. Three or four rounds of the most enthusiastic approbation greeted M. Weber on his entrance. He did not preside at the pianoforte, as was reported he intended to do, but merely stood in front of the stage, provided with a music-desk, and a bâton de mesure, to regulate the time of the performances—a task which he performed with extraordinary earnestness. M. von Weber is, in person, rather above the middle height, extremely thin, and of dark complexion. His countenance, which is striking and intelligent, appears to bear traces of profound study, rather than of vivid imagination; but he wore glasses, which tended to conceal the expression of his eyes. His deportment is gentlemanly, and remarkably unassuming. The first part of the Oratorio consisted of a selection of the most admired pieces of his own 'Freischütz,' commencing with the overture, which was enthusiastically encored. At the conclusion of the overture, and at the close of several of the pieces, M. Weber bowed in acknowledgment of his thanks to the performers, apparently anxious to transfer to them a portion of the vehement approbation which was so lavishly directed to himself . . . M. von Weber seemed to be much affected by the applause of which he was the object, but he showed no disposition to obtrude himself; on the contrary, he appeared rather to shrink from the notice of the audience." There is something of an artist's touch in the simple language by means of which the writer of the above notice manages to convey an historically accurate idea of the personality of the composer as he appeared during the last stage of his earthly career. A few weeks later, on June 5, 1826, Carl Maria von Weber expired at the residence of his host, Sir George Smart, in the prime of his manhood, and before he had completed the fortieth year of his existence. But "though he be dead, yet he speaketh," by virtue of the fecundity of creative works, born of a singularly versatile genius. In "Der Freischütz" we see the origin of a truly national German opera; in "Euryanthe" we recognise the prototype of "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin"; in "Oberon" that of Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and of the forest scenes in Wagner's "Siegfried." May the works of those who, in the domain of the German musical drama, worthily carried on the task begun by Carl Maria von Weber be as productive of good in the future as were those of the modest master, whose untimely death, in the fulness of his creative powers, we lament, even as we rejoice in the fact of his nativity, the one hundredth anniversary of which we have just been celebrating.

SIR GEORGE GROVE has an ingenious mind, and its products have contributed to the enjoyment and profit of us all. Nevertheless, we are very doubtful about the value of a notion propounded by him in a letter to one of our daily contemporaries. Sir George would reform the present method of performing dramatic cantatas, and this is what we should have if his suggestions were carried out: An orchestra and conductor sunk in a pit out of the sight of the audience, a comparatively small chorus, and ample space on the platform for the principal performers to group and help the realisation of the scene by some kind of gesticulation, which, however, shall not be acting. Sir George has but a poor opinion of the average imagination if he thinks that such aid is necessary to the full enjoyment of a piece like the "Golden Legend." But this consideration apart, how would imagination be helped by the spectacle of a gentleman gesticulating as Lucifer in evening dress? Such half-and-half devices would "realise" nothing and only excite ridicule. We fear that Sir George did not consider his idea fully before putting it in print, otherwise a man of his intelligence would have seen that there is no medium between the present concert-room performance and stage representation. Fancy a contralto going down on her knees in St. James's Hall to sing "Father of Heaven," and a tenor flourishing an imaginary spear as he sings "Philistines, hark." By the way, a part of the "Golden Legend" is supposed to be sung on horseback. How would Sir George convey that idea in a realistic manner?

THE "New use for Cathedrals" spreads apace, and has extended to Gibraltar. Mr. Digby, Organist of the "Rock" Cathedral, writes: "Following on the Dean of Gloucester's able ideas relative to musical festivals for the people, I have introduced them here with great success. As we have military bands, and a good organ in the Cathedral, it is an easy matter to get up first-class affairs at short notice. I send you a programme of my last, held on Thursday. It was a great success; his Excellency the Governor and the élite of the Rock being present." The programme forwarded by Mr. Digby shows that the band of the East Yorkshire Regiment played Mercadante's "Stabat Mater," the Prayer from "Mosè," and Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," and that the organ solos were the Barcarole from Sterndale Bennett's Concerto in F minor, Wély's Offertoire in G, and Guilmant's Allegretto in B minor, the choir singing Spohr's "As pants the hart," with Miss Burge as soloist. Mr. Digby's pupils, the Misses Stringer, also took a prominent part, as did Captain Wyon, Dr. Thomsett, and Miss Tottenham.

We might add that Mr. Digby has found a new use for military bands, in thus combining them with the more accustomed elements of a cathedral performance, and there can hardly be a doubt that the effect was very impressive. It must be exceedingly gratifying to Dr. Butler to find that his Gloucester idea is so rapidly bearing fruit in places far away from the spot where the first seed was sown.

We are indebted to a friend, who makes it his business to collect specimens of the vagaries of the provincial critic, for a further instalment of "gems,"—this time chiefly "Irish Diamonds." In one of the cuttings which he has sent us, two old friends are plainly discoverable, in spite of slight disguise, under the new titles of "Roses Softly Blowing" and "Hebrias the Creton"—evidently the masculine form of crétonne, unless, indeed, it be a misprint for crétin. Further on we read that one of the executants engaged at the Concert, which is the subject of the notice, "performed a ballad from Chopin." But these critical aberrations are quite eclipsed by a sentence in another notice of a "Bazaar and Concert" which was held in a church at Kilmallock. There we learn that a lady "gave 'The Blind Girl to her Harp' with much emotion and feeling, besides great taste of tone" (the italics are ours). This phrase, so far as we are aware, is wholly original and a positive stroke of genius. Elsewhere we find it recorded of a gentleman who got an "encoure" for a comic song entitled "Fox," that he "gave his songs with much verve 'Go,' and his voice is a baritone of good quality." This Concert was followed by a dance, apparently in the same church which had already been the scene of roulette, "a peep-show device," and much humorous vocalisation. The following anecdote comes to us from Manchester. Scene:—The Free Trade Hall. The plaudits which had greeted Mr. Lloyd's singing of a famous air by Handel have just died away. Laudator temporis acti in the stalls loquitur, "Why, Sims Reeves used to sing that song an octave higher!"

From Australia we have received news of the active interest shown in the cause of musical education in the colonies. It appears that some time ago the Hon. Francis Ormond, a gentleman whose generosity has been made manifest on many occasions in his own colony of Victoria, offered to give a sum of £20,000 for the advancement of music in that colony. Professor Ives, who holds the Music Chair in the University of Adelaide, at once gave it as his opinion that instead of creating another Music Chair in Australia, the interests of the art would be best served by founding a Conservatoire. Opinions being divided, Sir George Macfarren was appealed to, and in a letter to Professor Ives he thoroughly endorses his opinion. We may hope, therefore, that those in authority will see the desirability of acting upon a proposition so earnestly supported by one whose many years of experience should entitle him to speak with the utmost confidence on the subject.

Much interest attends the proposed celebration of the National Eisteddfod of Wales in the Royal Albert Hall. It is now many years since that ancient institution held high revel in the capital of King Lud, and Londoners may be expected curiously to watch proceedings whereof, from time to time, they have read so much. We understand that the arrangements of the Committee are commensurate with the special character of the gathering, and that many important competitions will be decided. In all probability the Eisteddfod will take place during the second week of August, when some of the following gentlemen may be found acting as adjudicators:—Sir George Macfarren, Mr. Randegger, Mr. Joseph Bennett, Mr. John Thomas, Dr. Joseph Parry, Mr. David Jenkins, Mus. Bac., Mr. G. H. Roberts, Mus. Bac., and Mr. Emlyn Evans

In view of a grand celebration of the Queen's Jubilee at the Crystal Palace next June, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie has undertaken to compose an Ode for soli, chorus, and orchestra. The work, though not lengthy, will be constructed on an imposing scale, and preceded by a formal overture, having themes of a popular and national character. Mr. Joseph Bennett is engaged to write the words. The Ode will be available for performance at Jubilee celebrations immediately after the rendering at the Crystal Palace.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

A very large audience gathered in the Royal Albert Hall on the 15th ult., to "assist" at a performance of Gounod's "Redemption," which work is coming more and more to the front as, we will not say a rival, but a companion to "The Messiah" for Christmas use. "The Redemption" has now clearly established itself in the position of a permanent favourite with English amateurs. Many of us, when the Trilogy was first heard, believed that no other result was possible, and said so. Some entertained a different opinion, and also put it upon record, but it would seem that the high court of public judgment has given its verdict in support of the more favourable view. This settles the matter, since there is no appeal. The performance, under Mr. Barnby's direction, calls for but few remarks, owing to its familiarity. As a matter of course, both orchestra and chorus were well up to their work, and discharged a favourite task in a manner that gave complete satisfaction. The principal solos were entrusted to Madame Albani, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Watkin Mills. Of these artists the two ladies had simply to repeat what they had accomplished before in the same place and under the same conditions. This they did and won the same success. The soprano in "From His love as a Father," and the contralto in the beautiful solo of the Virgin Mother, carried with them the sympathies as well as the admiration of the vast audience. Mr. Piercy acquitted himself well in the tenor music, though it would be unfair to compare him with Mr. Lloyd. He is evidently a rising and capable artist, who may attain eminence if he will resist the influence of success, and remember that nothing is done while anything remains to do. Mr. Mills sang throughout with his usual ability and force.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

The third Concert of the season was given at St. James's Hall, on the 14th ult., when two of the Leeds Festival novelties—Dr. Stanford's chorus "The Revenge" and Dr. Mackenzie's "Story of Sayid"—were performed for the first time in London. In memory of Liszt, the programme commenced with an orchestral arrangement of a March by Schubert in E flat minor, one of the four-handed Marches so well known to pianists. We need scarcely say that Liszt's scoring of this piece shows the master hand throughout, and can only regret that he has not sufficiently reverenced the original text in his endeavour to aid its effect by instrumental colouring. Before a London audience, Dr. Stanford's bold and characteristic music to Tennyson's poem created an effect fully equal to that produced on its first performance at Leeds. We have no hesitation in saying that nothing more fresh and spontaneous has been given to the world for many years; the vigorous treatment of the impassioned parts of the narrative, the subdued intensity of feeling underlying the quieter portions, and the appropriate orchestration throughout exciting the audience to a pitch of enthusiasm which the appearance of the composer on the platform, even twice over, could scarcely calm down. The choir must indeed have worked hard to give a rendering of the work so accurate and dramatic as to produce such a triumphant result upon the hearers; and Dr. Stanford may fairly congratulate himself upon having successfully shown us not only that there is a real English school of music, but that there are composers able and willing to perpetuate it. The proof of the solid worth of Dr. Mackenzie's "Story of Sayid" is that on a second hearing not only were first impressions strengthened, but many new beauties, both in the vocal and orchestral parts, were brought prominently into notice. The exquisite Oriental colouring—ever apparent, but never obtrusively so—invests the work with much interest throughout; and apart from the masterly treatment of every movement, the melodies appeal so irresistibly to every hearer that the composition cannot fail to attain popularity. As at Leeds, the Chorus of Maidens and the very original Solemn March produced a marked effect, and the solo for soprano, "First of His Prophet's warriors he," and that for tenor, "Where sets the sun," were received with overwhelming applause. Again the choir proved itself deserving of the warmest praise; indeed, in many of the most difficult choruses the precision with which the attacks were taken, in every department of this fine body of singers, surprised all who knew the limited time which could have been bestowed upon the work. The principal vocalists, Madame Albani, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Watkin Mills, gave the whole of the important music allotted to them with admirable effect, the fine solos already mentioned demanding, indeed, more than the customary tribute of praise; and a good word must also be said for Mr. Vaughan Edwardes, who, although having little to do, was perfectly satisfactory. Dr. Mackenzie, who conducted, was constantly greeted with warm applause during the performance, and at the conclusion received a perfect ovation.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

ALL friends of music must hope that the adverse rumours concerning the stability of this institution will prove to be unfounded. At first the efforts of the Council to restore the prestige of a time-honoured name were vigorous and well directed, but of late a falling off in energy has been discernible, and it cannot be said that the announcements concerning the present season are of a nature to excite much enthusiasm. The Society, perhaps for good and sufficient reasons, leaves to others the production of the festival novelties and new works generally, and to the most familiar oratorios proposes to add Costa's "Eli" and Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," both works of merit which other bodies studiously neglect. It will be interesting to note the result of this line of policy which, to outsiders, seems curious, if not rash. Still, it is a lamentable fact that owing to the steadily increasing demands of first-rate artists, it is becoming difficult, if not impossible, to make oratorio performances pay in St. James's Hall. Of course, second-rate vocalists can be engaged at lower fees, but experience proves that the public will not come to hear them, be the ensemble ever so good. The only real remedy is the erection of a larger central hall, a building that is much needed for public meetings of every kind as well as musical performances; but the chances of its being provided seem at present remote. We call attention to these facts in order that the Sacred Harmonic Society may not be unduly blamed for what seems a timid and vacillating line of action. The present season commenced on the 3rd ult. with a fairly satisfactory performance of "Judas Maccabæus." The soprano contingent of the chorus was weak and uncertain, but the other sections were equal to their duties. Miss Mary Beare and Madame Farnol, who divided the soprano solos, were both much applauded, and Miss Chester showed an excellent mastery of the true Handelian style, but she is rather inclined to force a voice not of the most sympathetic quality. Perfection is the only term that can be applied to the singing of Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Watkin Mills. Mr. Cummings conducted in an able manner.

The performance of "The Messiah" on the 17th was attended by a combination of misfortunes. The night was one of the most inclement of the present winter, which accounted for the somewhat thin attendance. Two of the principal artists, Miss Eleanor Rees and Signor Foli, were unable, through illness, to appear, and their places were taken by Miss Frances Harrison and Mr. Barrington Foote, criticism of whose efforts, under the circumstances, would be unkind if not unjust. Miss Annie Marriott, however, deserves a special meed of praise for her truly artistic rendering of the soprano airs, and Mr. Iver McKay, though he has still much to learn, showed improvement in the tenor music.

BACH CHOIR.

THIS body of amateurs entered upon a new season on the 13th ult. in a modest manner, being satisfied to occupy Prince's Hall, and regale their friends with a programme of unaccompanied choral works. We have no word of disparagement for an effort thus limited. As a matter of fact, the musical public does not hear half enough of concerted vocal music without accompaniment, the repertory of which is so full of excellence. By all means let the Bach Choir repeat the kind of Concert now under notice, and do so as often as they please. We shall not be the first to cry, "Hold, enough!" The programme contained many very interesting works; as, for example, Bach's Motett for two choirs, "Lieber Herr Gott," Felix Anerio's Motett, "Alleluia, Christus surrexit," and a Marienlied by Michael Pretorius. These examples of sacred art, as our fathers knew it, were capitally sung, under the direction of Dr. Villiers Stanford, and, we should say, had, in the eyes of most present, far more than an archæological interest. Good music, the production of real genius, may go out of fashion, but only with the frivolous and superficial. Others recognise and value that in it which is precious and abiding. English concerted vocal music was ably represented by selections from the works of Gibbons, Morley, Dowland, and Walmisley. These pieces once again asserted the high position of England in the department to which they belong. Let the so-called musical countries produce better of the kind if they can. As an agreeable relief from the choral pieces, Mr. Fuller-Maitland contributed some pianoforte solos, and Miss Lucy Stone introduced, in a very clever manner, Handel's fine Violin Sonata in A. The next Concert will be orchestral, and held in St. James's Hall.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE Fantasia for Orchestra in F, by Ferdinand Præger, which was performed for the first time at the Concert of November 27, is a work which, if less complicated in structure and pretentious in design, than the Symphonic Poem by the same author, played last season at these Concerts, is on the other hand marked by a much greater flow of sustained melody, at least in the two first movements. The Adagio, on the other hand, proved chaotic and dismal on a first hearing; but the vigour of the Finale went a good way towards reviving the favourable impression created by the earlier portions of the work. Mr. Ondricek's playing of the Beethoven Violin Concerto was looked forward to with pleasure by all who had heard him in the Mendelssohn Concerto at these Concerts last year, and may be fairly said to have fulfilled the highest expectations formed of his performance. Some strictures have been passed, and with justice, upon a certain want of dignity in his rendering of Joachim's cadences, but with this exception it would be hard to find any loophole for adverse criticism. His execution leaves nothing to be desired, and the certainty of his attack inspires his audience with the fullest confidence. Mr. Ondricek is admittedly one of the foremost living violinists, and only needs greater depth of feeling to rank even higher than he already does. Ernst's "Airs Hongrois," which he chose as a means of displaying his technique, are tawdry and commonplace compositions when compared to the more familiar Brahms-Joachim dances, but they served to exhibit his amazing dexterity and beauty of tone. The Overture to "Faniska," and a Suite from Mackenzie's "Troubadour" (Prelude to Act I. and "Jeu de Paume," Masque Music and Entr'acte to Act III.), were also included in the programme, and the vocalist, Mdlle. Trebelli, contributed the well worn "Bel raggio" ("Semiramide"), and "Saper vorreste" ("Un Ballo in Maschera"), earning an encore for the latter. Mdlle. Trebelli has a pretty and flexible voice, and considerable facility, but her invariable choice of florid music is a mistake.

The performance of "The Golden Legend," on the 4th ult., calls for very brief comment. Choir, Conductor, and principals (with the sole exception of Mr. Watkin Mills, who replaced Mr. King in the rôle of Lucifer) were the same as those who took part in the performance in St. James's Hall, while the audience, if not the same, were equally appreciative and almost as overflowing. The Crystal Palace orchestra, entrusted with the congenial task of interpreting a score where instrumental beauties abound, was thoroughly satisfactory, and the ensemble of the whole performance reached a high level of excellence. Mr. Watkin Mills's powerful organ stood him in good stead in the passages where Lucifer has to contend against the orchestra, and Madame Albani sang with the fine intelligence and intensity of feeling which render her unsurpassable in the representation of such a part. We may be pardoned, nevertheless, for uttering a protest against the bad example which this otherwise admirable artist sets, by her occasional carelessness in regard to the enunciation of the words in passages where it is certainly difficult to combine beauty of tone with distinctness of articulation, but where there is no excuse for singing nonsense. Noblesse oblige in art as well as in everything else, and a critic is justified in exacting full measure from an artist who has accustomed us to the highest excellence in almost every other part of her performance. "The Golden Legend" was preceded by a fine rendering of Beethoven's Overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses" (Op. 124), conducted by Mr. Manns.

In the absence of their habitual chief, Sir Arthur Sullivan again assumed command of the orchestra on the following Saturday, the 11th ult. This proved an unusually enjoyable Concert, a result for which the admirable playing of Mdlle. Kleeberg must he held largely responsible. Her performance in the famous G major Concerto of Beethoven, was marked by cleanness of touch and pointed vigour, alternating with great delicacy of execution and charm of expression. Mdlle. Kleeberg was heard later on in a graceful "Chant sans paroles," by Tschaikowski, and Mendelssohn's Andante and Presto agitato, well chosen pieces for the legitimate display of the performer's many excellencies of style. The Symphony was Beethoven's in B flat (No. 4), very finely played and enthusiastically applauded, while Sir Arthur Sullivan had every reason to be pleased with the rendering and reception of his "Sapphire Necklace" Overture, and the Prelude and dances from the incidental music to the "Merry Wives of Windsor." Mdlle. Agnes Janson, the vocalist on this occasion, who sang songs by Bizet, Massenet, and Tobias Matthay, has a mezzo-soprano of good compass, and considerable refinement of style, but is at present a most unequal and amateurish performer. By far her most successful effort was in Massenet's "Crépuscule," a song, however, which if sung in strict accordance with the composer's intentions, would be quite out of place in a concert-room of the dimensions of that at the Crystal Palace. Mdlle. Janson needs to correct a predilection for undue emphasis and the use of the tempo rubato, nor is her intonation infallible. But with many defects, she has undoubtedly promise, and should develop into a good singer.

Very scant honour has been paid in this country to the centenary of the birth of Weber. This, of course, is chiefly due to the scarcity of operatic performances with us, but we should have thought that concert-givers would have given more heed to the occasion than has been the case. However, the Crystal Palace directors did their duty in offering a programme of the master's works on the 18th ult., the 100th anniversary of his birthday. Being arranged in chronological order the items clearly showed the steady development of Weber's genius, for in his early efforts his individuality is not strongly pronounced. In 1807 he composed two Symphonies, both in C, for the Duke of Wurtemberg's orchestra, and the second of these was selected to commence the programme. It is a very slight unpretentious work with some touches of Haydnesque humour. In passing, it may be said that No. 1, which has never been performed at the Crystal Palace, is written on a larger scale, and is generally more effective. In the Clarinet Concerto in E flat, Mr. G. A. Clinton evinced a marvellous command over the technicalities of his instrument, and we may take this opportunity of suggesting that more frequent chances might well be given to the members of the Palace orchestra to appear as soloists. The Overtures to "Der Freischütz" and "Oberon," and the Concertstück, showed Weber in his full maturity. The last-named work was played correctly, but somewhat tamely, by Herr Bernhard Stavenhagen. A good word may be given to Miss Margaret Gyde for her neat rendering of the Rondo in C, best known as "Il moto continuo." The vocal music included the Finale to the first act of "Euryanthe," the master's last composition, Nourmehal's song from "Lalla Rookh," written for the celebrated Miss Stevens, and some of the male voice part-songs, in which, however, the choir did not appear to advantage. The Concerts will be resumed on February 12, when "The Revenge" and "The Story of Sayid" will be performed with the Novello Oratorio Choir and the same soloists as at Leeds and St. James's Hall.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Since our last record these entertainments have proceeded very quietly, and most of the programmes during the month may be dismissed with brief reference. For the sake of regularity we must commence with the Concert of Saturday, November 27. In this instance the scheme consisted of items which Mr. Chappell's public must know by heart. What is it possible to say of Haydn's Quartet in D (Op. 64, No. 1), save to record a very spirited performance under Madame Néruda's direction? Or of Chopin's Ballade in A flat, played in her customary artistic fashion by Miss Zimmermann? Or of Schubert's "Trout" Quintet in A (Op. 114), and Signor Bottesini's oft repeated Andante and Rondo from his Contrabasso Concerto in F sharp minor? Mrs. Henschel's vocal selections from Handel, Schumann, and Mendelssohn had the advantage of her husband's exquisite accompaniment, and were very much appreciated.

Very rarely is a popular programme upset by the absence of an artist, but an accident of this kind happened on the following Monday, Miss Zimmermann being unable to appear in consequence of illness. Owing to this, Sterndale Bennett's Sextet in F sharp minor could not be given, as Miss Fanny Davies, who took her place as pianist, naturally did not like to play the work without rehearsal. Opportunity was thus afforded for the revival of Onslow's Quintet in A minor. For some years Onslow enjoyed a large amount of favour as a composer of chamber music, but his fame had already begun to decline when the Popular Concerts were commenced, and his name only appears twice in the catalogue of works performed. What there is of beauty in the A minor Quintet may be traced to the influence of Spohr. The first violin part is written with great brilliancy and knowledge of effect, and it is easy to account for the temporary popularity of the composer. But his music lacks the true fire of genius, and hence it only stirs the pulses of listeners in a feeble kind of way. Miss Davies's solo was Mendelssohn's Andante with variations in E flat (Op. 82), and Signor Bottesini played two of his own pieces, the Concert ending with Mozart's tuneful Trio in D minor, No. 2. Mr. Herbert Thorndike deserves praise for introducing Schubert's magnificent song "Waldesnacht." It is astonishing, considering the voluminous nature of Schubert's vocal compositions, that singers should, as a rule, confine themselves to a few examples, leaving scores—nay hundreds—of treasures neglected.

Although "The Golden Legend" at the Crystal Palace drew thousands of amateurs away from London on Saturday, the 4th ult., St. James's Hall was quite full, the special attractions being Mendelssohn's finest chamber work, the Quintet in B flat (Op. 87), and Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata, in which Mdlle. Kleeberg made her first appearance this season. Gade's Pianoforte Trio in F (Op. 42), was performed for the first time. We must take another opportunity of speaking in any detail concerning this work, but we may say now that it is one of the Danish composer's most pleasing utterances. Miss Hope Glenn was the vocalist at this Concert.

"By general desire" Schubert's Ottet was repeated on Monday, the 6th ult., and now that a means has been discovered of avoiding the fatigue entailed by its extreme length, we should think it will be heard frequently "by general desire." On the present occasion the audience was very large and the enthusiasm immense. Two changes were made in the list of performers, Mr. Hollander replacing Herr Straus in the viola part, and Signor Bottesini taking the double-bass in place of Mr. Reynolds. The rendering was absolutely without flaw, and the effusive expressions of delight which followed every movement were fully justified. Another agreeable feature of the Concert was the refined singing, by Miss Louise Phillips and Madame Fassett, of three little duets by Mr. F. H. Cowen, from a set of six recently published. The numbers given were "Echoes," "Violets," and "What the birds say," and it is difficult to say which is the most charming. We must not forget to mention the perfect ensemble in the rendering of Schumann's Variations in B flat, for two pianofortes, by Miss Mathilde Wurm and Miss Fanny Davies, both pupils of Madame Schumann.

A familiar but attractive programme was provided on the following Saturday. Haydn's Quartet in E flat (Op. 71, No. 3) is one of the most vivacious and engaging of the entire eighty-three, and Brahms's Piano Quartet in G minor (Op. 25) has also become a popular work. As to the "Faschingsschwank," the statement in the programme that "All who know and love Schumann's pianoforte music must have this suite de pièces in peculiar affection," is one with which no one can disagree. Mr. Max Pauer rendered a fair amount of justice to the work. Mr. Santley contributed airs by Handel and Schubert.

The programme of Monday, the 13th ult., may be dismissed with equal brevity. We cannot regard Brahms's Quartet in C minor (Op. 51, No. 1) as one of the most pleasing of the composer's works. The first and last movements smell decidedly of the lamp, but the Romanza and the Scherzo are more fresh and attractive. Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor was the only other concerted work. Nothing need be said concerning Corelli's Violin Sonata in D, which Madame Néruda plays so often, nor Mdlle. Kleeberg's pianoforte solos; but a ludicrous error in the analytical programme showed how carefully descriptive notices should be revised from time to time. Speaking of Schubert's Impromptus, the writer was made to say, "The example introduced this evening by M. de Pachmann," &c. Mr. Piercy, who is steadily advancing as a tenor artist, contributed a charming "Love Song," by Bizet.

However frequently Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata for piano and violin is performed at the Saturday Concerts, it never fails to draw a crowded audience. We presume this is not the case on the Mondays, as the work has been given only once within the past seven years. The performance on the 18th, by Miss Zimmermann and Madame Néruda, was exceptionally fine. The rest of the programme was also made up of Beethoven's music, and included the Quartet in B flat (Op. 18, No. 6), the Violin Romance in F (Op. 50), and the Sonata in D minor (Op. 31, No. 2), of which Miss Zimmermann gave an extremely expressive rendering. Mrs. Henschel contributed "Kennst du das Land," and two airs from the "Egmont" music.

Nothing on the following Monday was more heartily and deservedly applauded than Mrs. Henschel's rendering of Liszt's song "Die Lorelei." The piece is one of the deceased master's purest inspirations, and it was sung with rare artistic feeling and charm. The audience was small, no doubt owing to the approach of Christmas, as the programme was by no means weak, containing, as it did, two such popular works as Beethoven's Serenade Trio in D (Op. 8) and Schumann's Quartet in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1). A melancholy interest attaches to Schubert's posthumous Clavierstück in E flat, as it was written shortly before his death, and may have been intended for the Scherzo of a Sonata. It was well played by Mr. Max Pauer, who also showed progress as an artist in Chopin's Polonaise in A flat. The Concerts will be resumed on the 8th inst.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

DURING the month just past four of these Concerts were given, under the direction of their founder, Mr. Henschel. On the 1st ult. was presented the Symphony recently composed by Rubinstein for the Philharmonic Society of Leipzig. Not much interest appeared to be felt in the production of this new work, experience having shown that the Moldavian musician is great only when engaged upon comparatively small things. Nevertheless, we decline to judge the Symphony in A minor off hand. It has several peculiar features to which the critic should be accustomed prior to expressing a definite opinion. It may, however, be doubted, without prejudice to the point just indicated, whether the new work will ever take rank among the foremost examples of its kind. An interesting feature is an attempt to construct a Finale according to a new design and upon what we take to be Russian national melodies. A second novelty at this Concert was an effective "Hymn to the Creator," by Mr. Henschel. Mr. Duvivier's Symphonic Poem "The Triumph of Bacchus" also had a hearing after some years of neglect. The programme of the 7th ult. contained a Pianoforte Concerto in C, by Hans Huber, played by Miss Agnes Zimmermann. Here again we have a wide departure from orthodox form, the composer choosing to abolish the first Allegro and take up its share with an extended slow Introduction. This brings two slow movements together, and is emphatically not a change for the better. The Concerto presents a good deal of interesting matter, but its chance of occupying a permanent place in our Concert repertory may be accounted very small. Mr. Hubert Parry's Gloucester "Symphony Suite" had a great and deserved success, as given under the composer's direction. It is an admirable work, and an experiment justified by results. Another interesting feature was a setting, by Berlioz, of Victor Hugo's "La Captive," sung by Miss Lena Little. The novelties introduced on the 15th ult., were a Violin Concerto in D, by Gernsheim, which, cleverly played by Mr. Ondricek, made a favourable impression, and is likely to be heard again. This Concert, however, was chiefly remarkable for a singularly perfect and poetical rendering of Schubert's Symphonic fragment in B minor. Mr. Henschel and his orchestra had previously done nothing better, and their achievement is not likely soon to be surpassed. On the 22nd were presented a selection from Weber in recognition of the centenary of that master's birth, Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, and two examples of Wagner, whose music Mr. Henschel by no means neglects.

THE HECKMANN QUARTET.

FROM the 6th till the 19th ult. the members of this body were engaged at Steinway Hall from day to day, in the performance of a mass of chamber music, so arranged as to illustrate the history of the string quartet since its form was established by Haydn. We fear that the enterprise was not very successful, and it could hardly be expected it would be. Too many performances were crowded into a fortnight's space, and that at a season of the year when the London mind is occupied with other things, and the London body finds home more comfortable than muddy streets and an atmosphere heavy with fog and reeking with vapour. Nevertheless the work undertaken was bravely carried through, enthusiasts thus having a rare opportunity not only to become better acquainted with some compositions which are seldom heard, but also to note the changes made in the spirit and expression, as well as, to a partial extent, in the form of chamber music. All the great composers in this field of art had a programme, or programmes to themselves. Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven were of course thus honoured, after them coming a long procession ending with living masters of the more "advanced" school. For obvious reasons we cannot enter into particulars of a whole fortnight's task, but may acknowledge the comprehensive knowledge and skill displayed by the Cologne artists, who once more illustrated the enormous advantages enjoyed by performers who are in the habit of working together. The members of the Heckmann Quartet are not unsurpassed man for man, but their ensemble is wonderfully perfect. We should add that their reverent treatment of the works performed puts aside all thought of merely personal display.

HERR PEINIGER'S RECITAL.

UNDER the title of "Recital"—not usually applied to the performance of a combination of artists—Herr Peiniger gave a Concert of chamber music on the 3rd ult., at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, the programme on this occasion having been devoted exclusively to compositions by M. Camille Saint-Saëns. The homage thus paid by the Concert-giver to the eminent French composer was fully justified in the selection made from his works, the majority whereof were admirable specimens of the melodious grace and structural transparency which generally characterise the pen from which they emanate. The composer himself taking a very active part in the performance, it may be coucluded that the utmost justice was rendered to every number in the programme. In his capacity of pianist, M. Saint-Saëns perpetuates the school of that distinguished French professor, M. Stamaty, whose worthy pupil he is, and again on this occasion, more especially in his solo number, a Caprice upon the Ballet music from "Alceste," he displayed the delicacy of touch, the exquisite finish and refinement of style appertaining to that school. The applause, so plentifully bestowed during the Concert upon the master whose productions the numerous audience had assembled to hear, was, however, fully shared in by Herr Peiniger, whose interpretation of the spirited Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso (Op. 28), and the somewhat laboured and uninteresting Romance in C major (Op. 48) for violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, testified to his exceptionally high attainments as a performer upon the queen of instruments. The Concert opened with a Pianoforte Quartet in B major (Op. 41), and concluded with the charmingly quaint and characteristic Septet for trumpet, violins, viola, violoncello, bass, and pianoforte (Op. 65), over the performance of which the adherents of both the "old" and the modern "advanced" schools might well join hands, and confess that there is something of a "poetic basis" common to both after all. In the performance of these concerted numbers the above artists were ably assisted by Messrs. Ellis Roberts, Charles Ould, Haydn Waud, and W. Morrow.

MR. NICHOLL'S VOCAL RECITALS.

A GLANCE at the programmes which Mr. William Nicholl offered at the Portman Rooms, on the 8th and 16th ult., was calculated to confuse one's ideas as to the difference between a Recital and a Concert. The etymology of the latter word is clear enough, and an entertainment carried out by half-a-dozen vocal and instrumental artists must surely be a miscellaneous Concert. However, we will not quarrel over names, the purport of the present notice being chiefly to call attention to the claims of Mr. Nicholl as an artist. He studied for a time, we believe, at the Royal Academy of Music, and later under Signor Vannuccini at Florence. His voice is a pure tenor, sympathetic in quality, and apparently of good compass. He has it well under control, and his style is characterised by perfect refinement. With all these qualifications in his favour Mr. Nicholl should have but little difficulty in making his way in his profession. The programmes of his Concerts were by no means destitute of genuine musical interest. Thus, on the first occasion, the first part consisted of Schumann's Spanisches Liederspiel (Op. 74), in which Madame Fassett, Miss Louise Phillips, and Mr. Bridson took part. Mr. Septimus Webbe was encored in his well rendered piano solos by Schumann and Liszt, and Mr. Nicholl introduced, among other items, two charming songs—"Of all sweet birds" and "What does little birdie say," by Dr. A. C. Mackenzie. At the second performance the first part consisted of solos by Handel. Two others are announced, for the 28th ult. (too late for notice in this number) and the 11th inst.

THE STROLLING PLAYERS' CONCERT.

THE Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society gave the first Concert of their fifth season in St. James's Hall on the evening of Saturday, the 11th ult. The hall was prettily decorated with plants and filled to the last seat with a sympathetic audience, whose good humour, indeed, had nothing to try it, for the performance was very good throughout, and, for an amateur band, quite wonderful. This result was in great part due to the exertions of Mr. Norfolk Megone, whose beat and indications of points were far clearer and more likely to give the players confidence than those of many professional conductors. Mr. Pollitzer, who led the band, had need at times of all his firmness to keep together the very large mass of violins—about 40 in number; but, on the whole, the accuracy attained was remarkable. The programme opened with the "Zauberflöte" Overture, in which the Allegro went very smoothly, and Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto was also most satisfactory. The strings were rather too powerful for the soloist—Miss Florence Waud—in the first movement, but the Finale went very well. Kalliwoda's Symphony (No. 1, in F minor) ended the first part of the programme. This work, which was excellently played, is a well proportioned, vigorous, and interesting composition after the model of Mozart, containing nothing that is wonderful and much that is beautiful; and in saying that there is nothing startlingly original either in its matter, form, or colouring, we wish the remark to be understood as implying keen delight and warm praise. In the second part the band threw plenty of vigour into the rendering of Délibes' "Coppélia" Ballet music, and the strings especially distinguished themselves in the Prelude to Act V. of Reinecke's "Manfred." Miss Anna Williams gave the familiar "Ave Maria" (Bach-Gounod), the violin obbligato being played by Mr. Pollitzer; but the whole lacked that unity and tranquillity so essential to the successful rendering of this composition. Miss Williams also gave Cowen's "Because," and Madame Marian McKenzie sang with considerable expression a Lullaby by Randegger, and two agreeable, though slightly amateurish, songs by Emily Troup. The Concert closed with Auber's "Exhibition" Overture.

"THE GOLDEN LEGEND" AT BOW.

A VERY successful and most creditable performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's Cantata "The Golden Legend" was given, on November 30, at the Hall of the Bow and Bromley Institute, by the choir of that institution, under the able and energetic direction of Mr. W. G. McNaught. The solo vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Grace Damian, Mr. H. Piercy, and Mr. C. H. Victor, whose efforts, as well as those of the choir, met with a full measure of appreciation on the part of a numerous and enthusiastic audience. The choristers were, for the greater part, sol-faists, singing from tonic sol-fa copies, and one could not but be struck with the readiness and accuracy of attack, and high general efficiency displayed by them throughout the performance. Among the more specially effective choral numbers we may instance the Evening Hymn, "O gladsome light," the tumultuous "Murderer! unbar the door!" and the Epilogue, "God sent His messenger." Again, the love duet, "We are alone," very ably rendered by Miss Williams and Mr. Piercy, proved to be one of the best received numbers in the work. Mr. Victor, though suffering from indisposition, gave due emphasis to the important and highly dramatic music appertaining to Lucifer, and Miss Damian was a satisfactory Ursula. It only remains to add that the well balanced orchestra (consisting of professional players) was fully equal to its allotted share in a performance of the new work, which reflected great credit upon all concerned.

THE NEW GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

THOUGH the interest of the Corporation of the City of London in the Guildhall School of Music has been evinced in the most practical manner, it cannot be said that the Music Committee went out of its way to render the ceremonial of the 9th ult. imposing and worthy of a great historic occasion. The amazing growth of the school within six years certainly justified to the full the mutual congratulations of the civic authorities, and we do not wish to say one word against the enterprise and genuine feeling for art which prompted the richest municipality in the world to inaugurate and liberally support an undertaking of this kind. Ten years ago the city would have seemed the last place in the world for the establishment of a gigantic musical academy. There was no proof that such an institution was needed, and the aldermanic mind was supposed to be given over to matters—to put it mildly—having nothing in common with art. The ice having been broken by the establishment of the Guildhall orchestra under Mr. Weist Hill, it was determined to make an attempt, and the use of a warehouse in Aldermanbury having been obtained, the doors were opened in September, 1880, when sixty-two pupils presented themselves. This was a good start, but by the end of the term the number had increased to 216, and in the second term to 445. In every succeeding term the register showed a steadily increasing total until 2,500 was reached, and the accommodation was stretched to its utmost extent. Outside the school the situation was regarded with by no means unmixed favour. It was said that the musical profession would become overcrowded by the addition of thousands of young people, it being assumed that the majority of the Guildhall students entered with the full intention of making the art a means of livelihood. Such an assumption was wholly gratuitous, and a comparison of the system in Aldermanbury and that in Tenterden Street or South Kensington would at once have shown its rashness. At the Royal Academy, or the Royal College, the student has to undergo a thorough course of training, and is made a musician in spite of himself; but at the Guildhall School he receives just as much tuition as he chooses to pay for, the main object being to qualify pupils for giving pleasure to themselves and their friends in the domestic circle. The institution therefore stands on a totally different footing from the regular academies at home and abroad, and that it has supplied a public want its worst enemies would not venture to deny. With the thoroughness which always characterises the city fathers, they quickly recognised the necessity for properly housing the school, and at an outlay of £22,000 a building has been erected on the Victoria Embankment which, if not architecturally imposing, is in every respect convenient and suitable to its purpose.

It was somewhat of an anomaly, as the Lord Mayor confessed, that the opening ceremony of one building should take place in another; but the largest room in the new structure being too small to accommodate the number of guests invited for the occasion, the noble hall in the City of London School was utilised for the purpose. As we have already said, the musical portion of the proceedings was mean and inadequate. Attached to the Guildhall School are two complete orchestras and a capable mixed choir, but their services were not utilised, the concerted music, consisting of the National Anthem and Gounod's beautiful Motett "Noël," being rendered by the ladies' choir, with pianoforte and harmonium accompaniment. A short programme of solos was to follow, but after two items the Lord Mayor and suite left the hall, and the proceedings came to an abrupt conclusion. This seemed rather inconsistent with his lordship's fervid address in praise of music, and while speaking of eccentricities it may be said that, although the speakers were perfectly justified in regarding the school as a feather in the Corporation cap, they might have attributed some of its success to the Principal, Mr. Weist Hill, and his staff of ninety professors, many of whom have attained the highest possible eminence as teachers. However, we will not dwell on these points. Enough that the Guildhall School of Music is an excellent work, happily conceived, and carried out with spirit and generosity.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

AT the Concert of Thursday, November 25, the chief interest attached to the vocal numbers contributed by Miss Elvidge and Miss Anna Russell, and the excellent viola playing of Mr. Kreuz in three Romances by Kiel. Of the two young ladies mentioned, Miss Elvidge was heard to advantage in Sterndale Bennett's "Dawn, gentle flower," and "To Chloe in sickness," which she sang with intelligence, refinement, and excellent enunciation. Miss Russell introduced two songs by Mr. Charles Wood, a Scholar of the College, which proved a welcome surprise to those who expected in them only the merit of clever exercises. In the first place Mr. Wood has made it clear that he fully understands his text, which in the case of "Ask me no more," is a most important requisite. The phrasing, moreover, shows an intelligent regard for the poetical rhythm, and lastly, the melody and harmony possess the rare quality of distinction. It is no exaggeration to say that Mr. Wood's setting of these famous lines is a really fine song. Miss Oldham's playing of Schumann's "Carnaval," though failing to render the grandiose sentiment of certain numbers, and being, on the whole, a disappointing performance, was marked by flashes of real intelligence. The renderings of Haydn's String Quartet in B flat (No. 1, Op. 50), and Spohr's Quintet in C minor (Op. 53), while highly creditable to all concerned, call for no special comment beyond a word of praise for Mr. Cook's crisp touch and clear execution in the piano part of the latter work. The feature of the Concert held on the 2nd ult. was the spirited playing of Messrs. Sutcliffe, S. Blagrove, Kreuz, and Squire in Beethoven's String Quartet in D (Op. 18, No. 3), which concluded the programme. In Chopin's familiar Prelude in C minor, and an Etude of Liszt's, Mr. Holden White showed himself to possess a very clear touch, while the phrasing and finish displayed by Miss Kitching in a Suite by Handel (No. 6, in F sharp minor), and by Misses Helms and Livesey in Mendelssohn's Andante and Variations (Op. 83a), testified to the excellent training which the pianoforte pupils receive at the Royal College. Mr. Houghton, who sang two MS. songs by Mr. Cook, a Scholar of the College, has a true tenor voice of light calibre but considerable sonority. Mr. Price threw a great deal of fervour into his rendering of the air "O Lisbona," from Donizetti's "Don Sebastian," but this excellent young artist should be cautioned against sacrificing that balance of intellect and emotion necessary to produce the greatest dramatic effects. At present he occasionally commits the artistic error of allowing his feelings to cause him to lose control over his voice. The programme also included two vocal duets by Donizetti and Cowen, and a Prelude and Fugue in E minor, for organ, by Raff. An overflowing audience assembled on the occasion of the last Concert of the term, quite exceeding the seating power of the West Theatre, and pointing imperatively to the need of moving to more commodious quarters. The test pieces for the College orchestra, conducted on this occasion by Dr. Stanford, were Mendelssohn's "Melusina" Overture, Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G (No. 4), and Schubert's Mass in F, besides the accompaniments to the duet between "Elijah and the Widow" ("Elijah"), and Mendelssohn's Concert Aria "Infelice," sung by Miss Julie Albu. In all these works a highly creditable ensemble was maintained, while the soloists in the "Elijah" duet (Miss Russell and Mr. Price) acquitted themselves satisfactorily. Mr. Barton, who introduced the cadences written by Mr. J. F. Barnett, was warmly applauded for a rendering of the solo part of the Concerto, which was marked rather by refinement than power. A word of praise is due in conclusion for the steady singing of the chorus in the Mass.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

FEW, if any, will be disposed to deny that it was a good move on the part of this long-established and highly respected institution to abandon its annual performance of "The Messiah" in St. James's Hall for a celebration in Westminster Abbey. Practically the change was for the better, as the public could be admitted in far larger numbers, the funds of the Society benefited in proportion; and from the point of view of abstract musical effect, comparisons, of course, must be all in favour of the new arrangement. Last year, though "The Messiah" was given up, the Society remained faithful to Handel, the master's "Dettingen Te Deum" being the principal item in the performance; but at the celebration on the 9th ult. his name did not appear in the programme, and occasion was taken in some quarters to remark that the attractive power of Handel is declining, a rash assertion in favour of which we do not believe any evidence can be forthcoming. Having expressed this conviction we can unreservedly praise the selection given. Seldom has the "Lobgesang" been heard under more impressive conditions, the choir and orchestra being thoroughly efficient, while the voices of Miss Annie Marriott (in place of Madame Valleria) and Mr. Harper Kearton told well in the solos. The audience or congregation were invited to join in the choral, "Let all men praise the Lord," but they did not generally respond. Subsequently, however, in Luther's Hymn, they atoned for this apparent coldness, and the effect of the rolling masses of sound was very fine. Miss Marriott sang with the utmost expression the beautiful air "From Thy love as a Father" (from "The Redemption"), and Dr. Bridge, to whom, as Conductor, the artistic success of the Festival was due, was represented as a composer by his setting of the "Hymn to the Creator" of St. Francis d'Assisi, produced at the Worcester Festival of 1884, and very favourably noticed in THE MUSICAL TIMES for October of that year.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

AN Orchestral Concert was given by the students of this institution at St. James's Hall, on the evening of the 10th ult. In Beethoven's Mass in C the progress of the choir, under the training of Mr. Barnby, was most advantageously displayed, the female voices, especially, being remarkable for precision and accuracy of intonation. The solo parts were well given by Miss Crabtree, Miss Hannah Jones, Mr. M. Humphreys, and Mr. Alec Marsh. The usual excellence in pianoforte playing was satisfactorily evidenced by Miss Ethel Boyce, in the Allegro from Beethoven's Concerto in G (with a clever cadenza composed by the performer), and by Miss Mabel Lyons, in two movements from Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor; Miss Cecilia Gates, in a portion of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, demonstrating the possession of very decided talent, and the result of sound tuition. Vocal solos were successfully given by Miss Armfield, Miss Selina Quick, and Miss Kate Condy. Mr. Barnby conducted with a care and watchfulness which could not fail to inspire the pupils with confidence.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Liverpool Philharmonic Choral Society, by a performance of "Elijah," on November 25, sustained old traditions, and this rendering of Mendelssohn's greatest oratorio was quite in keeping with the first appearance of the Society three years ago, which at once established it in popular favour. The delicate nuances of "He watching over Israel" and of the various short chorals, and the breadth and impressiveness of "Thanks be to God" and "Be not afraid" were the features of the choral work. The principals comprised Miss Whitacre, Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. The ladies were strangers to Liverpool, but both won high favour with the audience. Miss Whitacre evidences that her musical education in America has been of a finished and cultured character, and her fine voice will doubtless enable her to make rapid progress in her profession in this country. Mrs. Bolingbroke's rendering of "O rest in the Lord" was most pathetic, and created a great impression. The tenor, Mr. Humphreys, although suffering from a cold, sang his music with care and intelligence, and Mr. Pierpoint, in the important title-rôle, did full justice to the part, showing perhaps to the greatest advantage in "It is enough." Mr. Randegger conducted with his usual skill, and the accompaniments entirely devolved upon Mr. W. T. Best, who, in the absence of an orchestra, interpreted on the great organ in a wonderful manner the elaborate and beautiful orchestration with which Mendelssohn has enriched his masterpiece.

The Philharmonic Society's fourth Subscription Concert took place on November 23, and was chiefly notable by reason of the unfortunate absence of the esteemed Conductor, Mr. Charles Hallé, and of the solo vocalist, Madame Valleria, in consequence of indisposition. Mr. Alberto Randegger, however, with scarcely any notice, undertook Mr. Hallé's duties in directing the orchestral music, which included Wagner's "Siegfried" Idyll, Beethoven's Overture "King Stephen," and Schubert's Symphony in B flat, the rendering of these works by the band being all that could be desired. Mr. H. A. Branscombe, the Society's chorus-master, conducted the choral music, comprising Mr. Henry Smart's part-song "My true love hath my heart" and Mozart's "Splendente te Deus." The vocalist in the place of Madame Valleria was Miss Laura Smart, who justified the high local reputation which she has acquired; and Mr. Hallé's place as pianist was taken by Miss Fanny Davies. Notwithstanding the prominence which Miss Davies has gained in the Metropolis by her finished performances, this was the first opportunity afforded of hearing her in Liverpool, and her masterly rendering of Schumann's Concerto in A minor at once established her in local esteem. Her other pieces were Chopin's Prelude in D flat and Mendelssohn's Presto Scherzando.

The following Philharmonic Concert took place on the 17th ult., and served to reproduce Mackenzie's Cantata "The Bride," which had previously established itself in Liverpool, if not at these particular Concerts. The composition, although comparatively unpretentious and of lighter calibre than the more recent works of the same composer, bears the unmistakable stamp of masterly conception and ingenious scoring, and the closing number is a fine and effective specimen of writing for combined orchestra and chorus. The performance was not, however, altogether without blemish; there was no lack of intelligent appreciation of the character of the work, but there appeared to be a certain unfamiliarity with the music, both on the part of the soloists and the chorus, which somewhat militated against its complete success. The miscellaneous orchestral items comprised Saint-Saëns's "Phaeton," Raff's Symphony "Im Walde," and a characteristic "Rhapsodie Slave" in A flat, by Dvorák. The first-mentioned "Poëme Symphonique" bore traces of more than usual depth and scholarly workmanship, and will take high rank amongst Saint-Saëns's compositions.

The third and fourth Concerts of Mr. Hallé's own series took place in the usual course at the Philharmonic Hall, on November 30 and the 14th ult., but they naturally suffered from the regrettable absence of Mr. Hallé himself, whose continued illness has been a serious loss this season. It is, however, a satisfaction to know that he is now rapidly recovering. His place as Conductor has on both occasions been ably filled by his Manchester chorus-master, Mr. Edward Hecht. Miss Fanny Davies again acted as a welcome substitute at the first of these Concerts, and her re-appearance served to deepen the favourable impression which had already been formed of her executive powers. Mendelssohn's exacting Concerto in D minor was her chief effort, and her subsequent brilliant rendering of Rubinstein's "Valse Allemande" was most enthusiastically received. The Symphony on this occasion was Mendelssohn's in A major (the "Italian") and the vocal selections were entrusted to Mdlle. Trebelli, who has already established herself in Liverpool as a favourite.

At the Concert of the 14th, the first appearance of Mr. Ondricek in Liverpool occurred, and his reception was such as to warrant the expectation of hearing him again before long. His performance of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto at once indicated the thoroughness of his training and executive ability. His other selections were from Vieuxtemps and Paganini, and the glittering effect of his marvellous double stopping, and all the other resources of an accomplished violinist, raised a storm of applause, which was only satisfied by another excerpt, from a Suite of Ries's, equally interesting and brilliant. Miss Whitacre's second appearance in Liverpool, but for the first time at these Concerts, was welcomed. Her selections included Mozart's Recitative and Rondo, "Mia speranza," and the Polonaise from "Mignon," for both of which she earned hearty recalls.

An excellent performance of the "Creation" took place on the 9th ult. in Balliol Road Wesleyan Chapel, the artists being Madame Laura Smart and Messrs. David and J. Williams. The chorus was well balanced and effective, being under the able conductorship of Mr. J. G. Forsyth.

Mr. H. Stendner Welsing, one of our foremost local musicians, gave an interesting Pianoforte Recital, in St. George's Hall, on the afternoon of Saturday, November 27. The programme included specimens of Mendelssohn, Bach, Schumann, Scarlatti, Brahms, Grieg, Rubinstein, Chopin, and Liszt, in addition to Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 13), all of which indicated Herr Welsing's unimpeachable command of the keyboard, and the scholarly training which enables him to interpret so many varying styles with equal force and truthfulness.

Prominent amongst the musical events which add to the attractiveness of Christmastide, is the forthcoming six weeks' season of the Carl Rosa Opera, which has already been heralded by the issue of a programme replete with interest. There are to be thirty-six evening and six morning performances, and out of a répertoire of no less than fifty-eight operas, four are specially starred, either because of their entire novelty or comparative unfamiliarity to Liverpool audiences. First—Mr. F. Corder's new opera "Nordisa," which has been specially written and composed for Mr. Carl Rosa, another evidence of his encouragement of native talent. Then Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and Wagner's "Lohengrin," with Mr. Edward Scovel in the title-rôle and Madame Marie Roze as Elsa; and last, Flotow's tuneful "Martha," which has not been heard in Liverpool since the lamented Maas used to make it so popular by his assumption of the part of Lionel. This part is now to be taken by Mr. Seymour Jackson, favourably known to Liverpool, but now appearing in a new capacity as a member of this company.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

Our most important event during the month has been the visit of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie in connection with the annual distribution, in the district, of the certificates granted by the National Society of Professional Musicians. Following the example of Sir Frederick Ouseley and Mr. Cowen, Dr. Mackenzie delivered here a very interesting and suggestive address, from which we elsewhere give copious extracts. On the afternoon of the 15th ult. the large room of our Town Hall was crowded to celebrate the success of the Society, to listen to some admirably performed music by the advanced students, and to welcome one of our foremost champions of British music. During the early part of the meeting the venerable Mayor presided, the chair being, on his departure, taken by Mr. Alderman Harwood. Dr. Mackenzie's address on the "Aspects and Prospects of Music in England" was listened to with remarkable attention, and greeted with enthusiasm. Dr. Hiles proposed a vote of thanks, which was carried with acclamation. Miss Bertha Thomas, Miss Ada Lee, and Mrs. Stoneley evinced most promising talent as vocalists; Miss Marian Millar, Mr. Arthur Watson, B.A., and Mr. Walter Hornby played their piano solos successfully; and Miss Chartres gave a short violin solo with care and taste. In the evening the Society entertained Dr. Mackenzie and other distinguished visitors at a banquet, presided over by Dr. Hiles; and, two nights later, the eminent musician was the guest of the Brazenose Club, under the chairmanship of Mr. G. Freemantle. The certificates of the Society of Professional Musicians, awarded to the Liverpool and Southport district, were delivered in the former city by Dr. Mackenzie on the Thursday afternoon, and on Saturday, the 18th, a similar demonstration was held in Oldham, which, unfortunately, Dr. Mackenzie's engagements precluded his attending. The wife of the Mayor (— Radcliffe, Esq.) presented the certificates, and Drs. Gower, Fisher, and G. Marsden contributed much information as to the progress of music in Lancashire, and respecting the working and spread of the Society. In the report read at the Manchester and Liverpool meetings by Mr. E. Chadfield (Hon. General Secretary), it was stated that there had, during the year, been a very large expansion in the Society; and that in Liverpool the number of candidates for examination had trebled. The annual Conference of the Society will be held in Birmingham on the 5th, 6th, and 7th inst., and a very large gathering is expected.

I am sorry that our expectations of the rapid recovery to health of Mr. Charles Hallé have not been fully justified. Not until the middle of the month was he permitted to leave his room; and, of course, some little time must be allowed for his complete restoration. During his enforced absence Mr. Hecht (his chorus director) has ably and zealously conducted the Concerts. Following the performance of "St. Ludmila," Mr. Ondricek visited us on the 2nd ult., and, in his performance of the "Voix du Cœur" of Vieuxtemps, and of "Le Streghe" of Paganini, displayed astonishing executive skill. His interpretation of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto differed in some respects from that of previous great players. Signor Piatti was warmly welcomed on the 9th, and displayed all his old versatility and skill. At the same Concert, Mdlle. Hastreiter confirmed my conviction that her proper place is the stage rather than the platform. M. Saint-Saëns's skill in orchestration was exhibited in his Ballet music to "Henry VIII." In connection with these Concerts the death of Herr Grossè must be most regretfully recorded. Remarkable for beauty and purity of tone, for skill of execution, and for exquisite delicacy of shading, Herr Grossè had most ably occupied the position of first clarinettist for many years, and he leaves behind him a most enviable memory of his quietness and gentlemanliness.

The ninth Concert (on the 23rd ult.) was rendered especially interesting by the appearance of Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who played Rubinstein's Concerto in G major, and smaller pieces, including her own Gavotte in E minor, with faultless execution and taste, and was honoured with a double recall. The programme included Schumann's Symphony in B flat, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" and Beethoven's "King Stephen" Overtures, and Rubinstein's "Danse des Bayadères" ("Feramors"). Miss Alice Whitacre, in Mozart's "Mia speranza," Weber's "Tho' clouds" ("Der Freischütz"), and the Polonaise from "Mignon" (A. Thomas), showed a clear, light soprano voice and considerable execution, but a somewhat exaggerated style.

In addition to Mr. Pyne's customary Organ Recitals at the Town Hall, we have been favoured by a visit from M. Guilmant, on the 7th ult., and delighted by his skill as an executant and by his power as an extemporaneous player. Dr. J. H. Gower (of Trent College) gave, in the Chorlton Road Church, on the 3rd, a splendid display of his mastery of the organ, and his visits to Manchester are likely to be numerous and most welcome.

The visit to the Schiller-Anstalt of the Heckmann Quartet Party, proved very enjoyable. The impassioned, though fragmentary, phrases of the Schumann Quartet in A (Op. 41, No. 3), afforded the best test of the admirable understanding existing among the players, and of the perfection of their ensemble playing. The performers are, perhaps, not quite equally balanced; but the qualities of the violoncellist (Herr Bellmann) and of the first violin (Herr Heckmann) deserve special commendation.

On the 15th ult.—a day full of musical interest here—the students of the Blind Asylum gave evidence of their industry and of the perseverance of their teacher, Mr. Hague.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

The most successful Concert yet given by the not very successful musical section of the Midland Institute, took place on the afternoon of the 4th ult. The executants on this occasion included two soloists, Madame Agnes Miller, pianist, and Signor Foli, vocalist, and there can be no doubt that their presence contributed largely to the improved attendance. It was upon the members of the Institute Madrigal Choir, however, that the burden of the entertainment devolved, and it must be allowed that they acquitted themselves very creditably, and sang not only with precision, but with much refinement and expressiveness. Among their best efforts may be mentioned Sterndale Bennett's "Sweet stream," Wilbye's "Lady, when I behold," Smart's "Lady, rise," Macfarren's "Who is Sylvia," and Morley's "Now is the month of Maying." Signor Foli greatly delighted the audience by his singing of Meyerbeer's song "The Monk," Mendelssohn's "I'm a roamer," and the old German song "In sheltered vale," and Madame Agnes Miller displayed technique of a high order in Weber's lengthy and elaborate Sonata in A flat, exciting the applause of the audience still more by her playing of Mendelssohn's Capriccio in A minor (Op. 33, No. 1). Dr. Rowland Winn accompanied the vocal solos with tact and skill, and Mr. Stockley conducted the choral numbers with his accustomed ability.

An interesting Concert was given at the Masonic Hall, on the 6th ult., by Mr. and Madame Oscar Pollack, with the assistance of other local artists, and was attended by a large number of the general public, as well as by the pupils and connections of the bénéficiaires. In the instrumental section, the most noteworthy items were Grieg's Sonata in F, for violin and piano (Op. 8), the Duo Concertante for two pianos (Op. 4), by Mr. C. Stephens, and the Finale of F. E. Bache's Trio for piano and strings. Mr. Pollack gave a skilful and musicianly rendering of Franz Bendel's pianoforte solo, "Am Genfer See," besides taking part in two pianoforte duets and joining Mr. Abbott in the Grieg Sonata; and Madame Pollack, who possesses a well trained voice of excellent quality, charmed her hearers especially in Braga's familiar Serenade. Mr. Abbott was very effective in Ernst's "Elégie." Mr. Owen gave great satisfaction by his performance of a "Danse Hollandaise" for violoncello, by Dunkler, and Mr. Troman shared the responsibilities of pianist with Mr. Pollack. Mr. S. Fenn's agreeable tenor voice was heard to advantage in Ascher's somewhat hackneyed ballad, "Alice, where art thou?" as well as in a tuneful MS. duet by Mr. Pollack, in which he was joined by the composer's wife.

The attempt to revive Italian Opera has not been very successful so far as Birmingham is concerned, and it is to be feared that the short season of six nights, commenced here by Mr. Mapleson's Company on the 6th ult., must have resulted in heavy loss to the management. Birmingham is not generally indifferent to the blandishments of opera; but in this case the majority of the artists were unknown here, and the scale of charges, though moderate for Italian Opera, was considerably higher than that to which Mr. Carl Rosa has accustomed the local theatre-going public. The company comprised, among other leading artists, three prime donne, Mdlle. Nordica, Mdlle. Louisa Dotti, and Mdlle. Marie Engle; a new and promising mezzo-soprano, Mdlle. Hastreiter; two leading tenors, Signor Runcio and Signor Vicini; and several baritones and basses, of whom the most noteworthy were Signor del Puente and Signor Padilla. Several of these artists, though new to Birmingham, are well known to London opera-goers, and there is no need, therefore, to discuss their qualifications here; but Mdlle. Hastreiter is a stranger who seems destined, as the French say, to "go far," and she will assuredly be heard of again. Both as actress and singer she possesses qualifications of a high order, as was shown here more particularly by her Azucena and Ortrud, though she is full young for the former part. Mdlle. Marie Engle charmed by her grace and appearance, no less than by the pure and sympathetic character of her very light soprano voice, and her assumption of Marta in Flotow's opera, excited considerable enthusiasm. Signor Vicini possesses a robust tenor voice of considerable power and range, but he is a somewhat unequal singer and uncertain in his intonation. The band and chorus, under Signor Vianesi, were fairly good, though the latter was at times a little rough and noisy.

The second Concert of the Festival Choral Society, which took place on the 9th ult., was of a composite character, embracing, besides Randegger's dramatic Cantata, "Fridolin," Mr. Anderton's Choral Ballad, "The Norman Baron," and a selection from Massenet's "Scènes pittoresques." The principal vocalists were Madame Georgina Burns, Mr. Barton McGuckin, Mr. Robert Grice, and Mr. Watkin Mills, and the choral and orchestral executive numbered about 400 performers, with Mr. A. R. Gaul as organist, and Mr. Stockley, as usual, conducting. "Fridolin" was composed for the Birmingham Festival of 1873, but notwithstanding the very flattering reception then accorded it, the Cantata had been only once repeated here, some nine years ago, until the Festival Society took it in hand this season. It was, therefore, for a large proportion of the audience on this occasion, practically a new work. "Fridolin" certainly possesses many elements of popularity in the shape of a strong and stirring libretto, based on Schiller's "Gang nach dem Eisenhammer," abundance of melody, dramatic spirit, and graphic orchestration; but the music is rather trying, both for band and chorus, and it is only musical organisations of exceptional strength and excellence that can attack the work successfully. Its performance on this occasion was a fairly effective, though not immaculate, one, the band-playing occasionally lacking refinement and expressiveness, and some of the principals failing in true dramatic feeling. Madame Georgina Burns, as the Countess, sang with unfailing charm and brilliancy, but scarcely with all the tenderness and passion the part admitted of. Mr. McGuckin, upon whom the rôle of the enamoured page Fridolin devolved, was in excellent voice, and satisfied all the exigencies of the music. Mr. Grice revealed unexpected powers in the part of the jealous Count, and sang the music admirably; but the dramatic requirements of the Iago-like character of Hubert were scarcely fulfilled by Mr. Watkin Mills, though in a merely musical sense his performance was very satisfactory. The choruses throughout were admirably rendered. The band was excellent in some of Massenet's "Scènes pittoresques," which were warmly applauded, and Mr. Anderton's choral setting of Longfellow's "Norman Baron" gave the chorus opportunities of distinction which were fully taken advantage of.

Much regret is expressed in local musical circles at the abandonment of the Birmingham Philharmonic Union, a choral body which at one time enjoyed a very fair measure of popularity and prosperity under the conductorship of Dr. Swinnerton Heap. For the last two or three seasons, however, the Society's income has not sufficed to cover the expenses, and it was resolved at a special meeting of the members on the 17th ult. to wind it up.

The usual Christmas performance of "The Messiah," by the members of the Festival Choral Society, took place in the Town Hall, on the 27th ult., with Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Hilton, as vocal principals, Mr. W. A. Langston as organist, and Mr. Stockley conducting.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

The production of Sir Arthur Sullivan's Oratorio "The Light of the World," by the Leeds Philharmonic Society, at a Concert given in the Leeds Coliseum, on the 1st ult., was one of the most interesting events of the month. It was not the first time the work had been heard in Yorkshire, but it had all the charm of novelty, and Sir Arthur Sullivan's local popularity contributed no little to its attractiveness. Hence there was a large audience to hear the performance, and the work had a most favourable reception. The band left nothing to be desired, which is saying a great deal, considering that it had been gathered from different sources. Herr Schiever proved an efficient leader. The solo parts were fairly well sustained. Miss Thudichum and Miss Wilson sang with their customary carefulness and refinement; the music of the part of Jesus was delivered with much dignity by Mr. Oswald, and Mr. Wood Higgins sang the subsidiary bass solos. Mr. Liddle presided at the organ. The Conductor was Mr. Alfred Broughton, who discharged his duties with skill.

On the 11th ult. "St. Paul" was produced in St. George's Hall, Bradford, at the third Bradford Subscription Concert. The work was given under the same auspices twelve years ago. The performance was in every respect a fine one, and no little credit is due to the Conductor, Mr. Hecht, who, in the absence of Mr. Hallé, through indisposition, was entrusted with the bâton. The choir sang with exquisite effect both in the heavier numbers, requiring volume of sonority and dash, and in those which require restraint and refinement of the combined forces. The solo music was in the hands of Mrs. Henschel, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Henschel. Mr. Clough presided at the organ. Bradford is indebted to Mr. Sewell's enterprise for a visit from one of our most popular English composers, Mr. F. H. Cowen, who came down on the 11th ult., to conduct a representative selection of his music at one of the Saturday Popular Concerts. Mr. Cowen had a reception worthy of his popularity, for not only was the audience a large one, but it was full of intelligent enthusiasm. Some portion of the programme consisted of Mr. Cowen's songs, for the rendering of which no more efficient artist could probably have been engaged than Madame Clara Samuell. The instrumental selections included the suite "Language of the Flowers," the Scandinavian Symphony, and "Melody and l'Espagnole." The band gave a very creditable interpretation of the exquisitely picturesque music, and especially of the six dainty tone-pictures of the flowers. The Symphony was perhaps least perfectly played, but the faults were of a trifling kind. During the evening Mr. Cowen received a floral wreath and much applause.

Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers.

The Saturday Popular Concert movement derived considerable impetus from a Concert given in St. George's Hall, on November 27. The attendance was much larger than at any previous Concert, but it was altogether owing to the introduction of performances by the military band of the Bedfordshire Regiment, now located at Bradford. The band is above the average of similar organisations in point of ability, and gave much enjoyment to those who heard it.

The second of the Leeds Popular Concerts took place on the 8th ult. Owing to the indisposition of Mr. Hallé it was necessary to modify the programme, in so far as related to the solos which he was announced to play, but the audience had the pleasure of hearing an equally distinguished substitute in the person of Signor Piatti. The famous violoncellist, needless to say, met with a very warm reception. His solos comprised a couple of movements from a Concerto written for him by Molique, a Largo by Boccherini, and his own Bergamasco. Mr. Hecht ably filled Mr. Hallé's place at the desk, and it is no small compliment to him to say that the performances of the band went quite as smoothly as if the venerable Conductor had himself wielded the bâton. The test was no easy one. Raff's "Im Walde" Symphony was novelty of a genial type, and in places elicited loud applause. By way of in memoriam tribute to Weber, the centenary of whose birth occurred on the 18th ult., the first item placed on the programme was the Overture to "Der Freischütz," and the scena "Durch die Walde," which latter Mr. Ben Davies rendered with much effect. Rubinstein's ballet music to "Feramors," Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi," and prelude and introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" were other items of a programme which in point of general interest could scarcely have been surpassed.

Mr. Isidor Cohn gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Church Institute, Bradford, on November 26. This was his début, though he had played many times previously in Bradford. The Recital included works by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Henselt, Field, Chopin, and others. The pianist acquitted himself admirably of an arduous undertaking, in the course of which he thoroughly gained the approval of his hearers. He has a light, crisp touch, and very refined taste. He appears to have studied both the technical and the intellectual parts of his profession to good purpose. Madame Ter Meer assisted Mr. Cohn in the capacity of vocalist.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE two grand Concerts given by the Bristol Musical Festival Society, on November 26 and 27, drew, as might be expected, large and interested audiences. The programmes were most attractive, Berlioz's "Faust" being given at the first Concert, and Beethoven's "Engedi" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," at the second. Upon "Faust" much care had evidently been expended, and the hard-working chorus-master, Mr. D. W. Rootham, is to be congratulated on the spirit and resolution with which his choir performed its difficult task. In Berlioz's work the part of Margaret was entrusted to Miss Mary Davies, that of Faust to Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mephistopheles to Mr. Santley, and Brander to Mr. Worlock, and the whole of the solos were, as a matter of course, admirably performed; but we should like to offer a word of special praise to Miss Davies for her really fine and artistic rendering of her share of the music. Mr. Hallé's band did all that was possible for the instrumental portion of the Concert, the place of the Conductor, Mr. Charles Hallé (who was too ill at the time to fulfil his engagement), being most efficiently filled by Dr. Bridge, whose able and musicianly conducting contributed not a little to the success of the Concerts. The "Engedi" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" are both familiar works to the Festival Choir, and the choruses went well on the whole, though now and then a want of firm attack was observable. The soloists were Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. In the interval between the two choral works, Mr. Hallé's band played Siegfried's "Trauermarsch" and the "Walkürenritt" (Wagner). The leader was Herr Straus.

The last but one of the Monday Popular Concerts for the present season was given on the 6th ult., at Colston Hall. Three works of great interest were produced on this occasion—namely, Mendelssohn's Overture "Fingal's Cave," and Concerto, for violin and orchestra, and Mr. Prout's new "Oxford" Symphony, No. 4, in D major. This last was conducted by the composer, who, as usual, met with a hearty reception, and who expressed himself greatly pleased with the fine rendering his work received at the hands of Mr. Riseley's band. At the conclusion of this most interesting and scholarly composition, both audience and orchestra joined in a tribute of warmest applause, and Mr. Prout had to return to make his acknowledgments. In Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin and orchestra, Mr. T. Carrington, leader of the band, most ably sustained the solo part, playing the whole from memory, and displaying a thorough knowledge of the resources of his instrument. His excellent performance deservedly won for him a hearty recall. The vocalists were Miss Wilson, Mr. Fredericks, and Mr. Montague Worlock.

The sixth and last of the Bristol Monday Popular Concerts for this season took place in the Colston Hall, on the 20th ult. An additional attraction was offered on this night in the performance of several vocal numbers written for ladies' voices, and the works chosen were both beautiful in themselves and were rendered even more strikingly so by the exquisite singing of Mr. Riseley's choir of 200 ladies. The five selections were "O praise the Lord" (Mendelssohn), "The Lord is my Shepherd" (Schubert), and "God in Nature," by the same composer; a chorus from Prout's "Hereward," "Bright is the day," and the choral music in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," in which last Miss Gane, a member of the choir, sang the solo portion. The Overture, Scherzo, and the whole of the instrumental portion of the work, were most artistically played by the band. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Beethoven's Overture "Leonora" received a splendid and most vigorous rendering. At the close of the Concert, a testimonial was presented to the honorary Conductor, Mr. George Riseley, consisting of a purse of 410 guineas, a music cabinet, and an address from the citizens.

On the 9th ult. Mrs. Viner Pomeroy gave her second Concert of this season, with different arrangements, having engaged the larger of the Victoria Rooms, and supplementing the usual body of executants with vocalists, in order to popularise these entertainments to a wider degree, and to secure for them a more extended support. There was but one string quartet given, that by Haydn in G (Op. 77), played in excellent style by Mr. Henry Holmes (1st violin), Mr. J. Pardew (2nd violin), Mr. Ellis Roberts (viola), and Mr. J. Pomeroy (violoncello). The Concert opened with Beethoven's Trio in B flat (pianoforte, clarinet, and violoncello), the executants being Mrs. Pomeroy, Mr. Egerton, and Mr. Pomeroy. Mr. Holmes gave two violin solos, and the remaining instrumental item was Weber's Duet in E flat, for piano and clarinet, in which Mrs. Pomeroy and Mr. Egerton were heard to great advantage. The vocalists were Madame Wilson-Osman and Mr. Montague Worlock.

The Bristol Musical Association gave its forty-fourth Concert on the 11th ult., when Colston Hall was full in every part. The chief interest centred on the production of Dr. Stanford's Choral Ballad "The Revenge," which was on the whole fairly given. We are glad to point out the energy and musical enterprise of the Conductor and his band and choir, in providing these popular Concerts so often in Bristol, and at such prices as to be within reach of all classes. The remainder of the programme consisted of miscellaneous vocal and instrumental solos, given by Miss Ellicott, Miss G. Freund, Mr. G Cox, and Mr. Lawford Huxtable (vocalists); Miss Bennett (piano), Mr. Gardner (violin), Mr. Ace (piccolo), and Mr. G. Riseley (organ).

The Sarum Choral Society gave its second Concert of the season at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 8th ult. The programme included Spohr's "God, Thou art great," Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," Handel's Coronation Anthem, Schubert's Symphony in B flat, Spohr's Quartet in G minor, &c. The principal vocalists were Madame Wilson-Osman and Mr. Ralph Dawes, who acquitted themselves most successfuly. The orchestra, numbering about thirty performers, and led by Mr. Charles Gamblin, gained a large share of applause for the Schubert Symphony. Mr. W. P. Aylward conducted, as usual.

At Exeter, on the 7th ult., the Oratorio Society gave its first Concert sinceits re-organisation. Handel's "Messiah" was the work performed, and the soloists were Miss Fusselle, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Frank May. The choruses were for the most part well sung, as were also the solos; but there was a certain amount of unsteadiness about the band, which we hope may be remedied before the next performance. Mr. E. M. Vinnicombe rendered good service at the organ, Mr. Walter Morrow was solo trumpet, and Mr. G. W. Lyon conducted very efficiently.

The Madrigal Society's Concert, on the 15th ult., included several items of interest, notably a Serenade composed by Mr. W. Bayly (late Conductor of the Society), which was received with much applause and redemanded. The chorus was somewhat increased in numbers and advanced in proficiency, thanks to the careful training of the present Conductor, Mr. R. B. Moore, Mus. Bac.

On the 18th ult. the third Subscription Concert (for the year) of the Orchestral Society attracted a good audience. The programme was of a popular character, and the performance gave evidence of careful practice on the part of the members. The vocalist was Miss Lilian Arden.

At the Victoria Hall Organ Recital, on the 4th ult., a piano and violin were used in conjunction with the organ. Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B minor was excellently played by Miss Hester Waller, and in this, and the Andante from the same composer's Violin Concerto (Mr. Barré D. Bayly), the orchestral accompaniments were given on the organ by Mr. D. J. Wood, the Organist of the Cathedral.

The Bath Choral Union opened its thirteenth season on the 9th ult., under new auspices, a committee of citizens having undertaken the management instead of the originator and Conductor, Herr Sondermann, who has hitherto carried on the Concerts with perseverance and credit, though at great personal sacrifice. The works given were Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus." The choruses were very fairly sung, and showed that the choir had been well trained by Herr Sondermann. The solo singers were Miss Carlotta Elliott, Miss F. Edwards, Mr. H. Piercy, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike.

The Plymouth Vocal Association gave its Subscription Concert for the present season on the 8th ult., at the Guildhall, Plymouth, when Mendelssohn's "Elijah" formed the programme. The band and chorus numbered 300 performers, and the principal artists were—Miss Anna Williams, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Signor Foli. Leader of the orchestra, Mr. Pardew; Hon. Organist, Mr. Faull; Hon. Conductor, Mr. F. N. Löhr. Mr. Löhr must be heartily congratulated on the splendid manner in which his choir and band acquitted themselves.

The same Association performed Handel's "Messiah" on the 22nd ult., with full band and chorus, the solos being taken by members of the choir. At the next Concert, Gounod's "Mors et Vita" will be produced on a grand scale, with a largely increased choir and orchestra. Thoroughly efficient soloists are engaged, and Mr. Löhr will conduct, as usual.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Michaelmas Term, just closed, has been marked by considerable activity in musical matters at Oxford. Chief amongst its events was the performance of the "Hymn of Praise" and "Woman of Samaria," on November 12, by the Choral Society, with Miss Hilda Coward, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Sutton Shepley as soloists. Since Dr. Roberts undertook the conductorship of this Society, it has been recovering with great rapidity the efficiency and prestige it had lost, and it is no exaggeration to say that the chorus-singing at this Concert was by far the best we have heard in Oxford for many years. The Concert given by the Madrigal Society, on the 2nd ult., was also conducted by Dr. Roberts, and was thoroughly successful except as regards the numbers of the audience. The programme and the performance deserved almost unqualified praise.

Two Concerts of Chamber Music require a word or two of mention. The University Musical Club gave a public Concert in Christ Church Hall, on November 8, the programme of which was almost exclusively selected from the works of Dr. C. H. H. Parry, the Choragus of the University. On November 30 an Invitation Concert was given in the same hall by the University Musical Union, at which the Heckmann Quartet performed. The only feature of the Concert that calls for notice was a String Quartet, by Mr. Hadow, of Worcester College. This Quartet was written a year ago for the University Musical Union, and performed in their rooms. It has since been published, but had not been previously played in public. It made a great impression on the audience, who gave the composer an enthusiastic reception.

The Professor of Music concluded his series of Lectures on "Spanish Church Music" on the 7th ult., when, as on previous occasions, a number of illustrations from Eslava's scarce work were excellently performed. The subject announced for next term is "English Music of the Restoration Period."

The College Musical Societies have done very little. A Concert of music for men's voices was given in Balliol College Hall, on the 7th ult., by a number of lay-clerks from the various choirs of Oxford. The music was admirably selected and, it need hardly be said, admirably rendered. At Merton a "Shakespeare Concert" was given on the 10th ult., bnt there was nothing about it requiring further notice. Both these Concerts were directed by Mr. John Farmer.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Italian Opera Company gave morning Concerts in the Music Hall on November 22 and 29. These Concerts proved so popular, that at the second numbers of people were refused admittance, there being not even standing room in the hall. To Mdlle. Hastreiter, as in the operatic performances, deservedly fell a large share of the applause, for rarely is heard so sympathetic and true a voice. In "Lohengrin," her performance of Ortrud was artistic to a degree. Mdlle. Jenny Broch, in the "Barbière," made a capital Rosina, her high, clear voice and sprightly acting suiting the part admirably.

On the afternoon of the 4th ult., Mr. Townsend gave a Pianoforte Recital to a large audience. The programme was well chosen, and included Weber's Sonata in D (Op. 24), Beethoven's Andante in F, selections from Chopin, Schumann's "Carnaval," and pieces by Liszt and Henselt. All were excellently rendered by the talented artist.

On the evening of the 6th ult., the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society gave the first of three annual performances. This Society consists now of about eighty members, and, under the conductorship of Mr. Carl Hamilton, does good work. Beethoven's "Prometheus" Overture, a Symphony of Haydn's, and the orchestral accompaniments to Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto were the principal items. The pianoforte part was creditably played by Miss Gillespie (pupil of Mr. Otto Schweizer). The vocalist, who gave a fair rendering of a Recitative and Aria from Mozart's "Titus," was Miss Kunz, who has lately returned from the Leipzig Conservatorium.

The ninth series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Manns, opened on the evening of the 8th ult. Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" was the first number, followed by the last interlude from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," Beethoven's Concerto for violin and orchestra, Schubert's (Unfinished) Symphony (B minor, No. 8), and Tschaikowski's "Caprice Italien" for orchestra. Mr. Franz Ondricek made his first appearance here on this occasion, and displayed surpassing technique in the Beethoven Concerto and in Paganini's Fantasia "Le Streghe."

The choir of the Cathedral of St. Mary, under the direction of Mr. Collinson (Organist), gave, on the 10th ult., a performance of Spohr's "Last Judgment." The choruses were well sung and the bass solos, especially the recitative "The day of wrath is near," were excellent.

Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" was given by the Choral Union on the 13th ult. The production of this celebrated work was anticipated with great pleasure, and the expectations of the audience were more than realised. Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. John Bridson sustained the solo parts. The quartet "Quis est homo" left nothing to be desired; the soprano and tenor duet "Fac ut portem," and the alto solo "Inflammatus et accensus," received an admirable interpretation. The choir was satisfactory, excepting a tendency to flatness in the high notes of the sopranos and tenors; but on the whole, considering the difficulty of the work, much credit is due to Mr. Collinson, the Conductor.

Madame Agnes Drechsler Hamilton (violinist) gave a Chamber Concert on the evening of the 14th ult., in the Masonic Hall. She was ably assisted by Mr. Carl Hamilton (cellist) and Mr. Francis Gibson (pianist). Master William Hamilton, ten years of age, made his début on this occasion, and played a Violin Concerto of De Beriot very creditably. The other numbers were Schumann's D minor Trio and Grieg's Violin Concerto, in which Madame Drechsler Hamilton distinguished herself particularly. Mr. Carl Hamilton's solo was a pretty Romance composed by Mr. Francis Gibson.

The annual Concert of the St. Giles's Choral Society took place in the Cathedral on the 23rd ult., on which occasion Haydn's "Passion Music" and selections from "The Messiah" were performed.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND WEST OF SCOTLAND.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE first Subscription Concert of the thirteenth series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts took place on the 7th ult., under circumstances which gave earnest of a successful season, both as regards the quality of the performances and the attendance of the public. A brilliant rendering of the Overture "Benvenuto Cellini" (Berlioz), opened the Concert. The introduction to the third act of "Tannhäuser," entitled "Tannhäuser's Pilgrimage," was then played, and with as much appreciation as could be expected in the absence of connection with a performance of the opera. Other orchestral selections following in the course of the evening were the Unfinished Symphony, No. 8, in B minor, of Schubert, and the Capriccio Italien (Op 45), by Tschaikowski, the interpretation of the former being marked by grace and poetic feeling, and that of the latter by spirit and delicacy. The Violin Concerto of Beethoven, with Mr. Franz Ondricek as soloist, was altogether as effectively presented as ever it had been here before.

The first of the Concerts at popular prices took place on Saturday evening, the 11th ult., when there was a very large audience. The programme opened with the "Exhibition" (1862) Overture, by Auber, the only one of the four then commissioned works which has survived the occasion; Saint-Saëns's Symphonic Poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the Vorspiel to "Parsifal" (Wagner), and the Ballet Suite "Sylvia" (Délibes), followed in course; also, Beethoven's No. 1 Symphony, the set of nine of which is to be given during the season, in due succession, either at the Subscription or the Saturday night Concerts. Mr. Franz Ondricek again appeared, and played with great acceptance Ernst's Fantasia on Hungarian airs; and, as an encore, Raff's now well-known Cavatina.

What may be considered the great event of the season took place on the 14th ult., when a very large audience assembled to hear a performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's Cantata "The Golden Legend," and Dr. Villiers Stanford's Choral Ballad "The Revenge." The orchestra was thoroughly efficient in the Prologue, and despite a little coarseness on the part of the male chorus, and the occasional inaudibleness of Mr. John Bridson, as Lucifer, when singing against the chorus and orchestra, this masterly, and I think, taken altogether, highly original musical depiction created a profound impression. Scene I., that between Prince Henry and Lucifer, was delicately interpreted on the part both of the band and Messrs. Lloyd and Bridson, and in Scene II., the beautiful Evening Hymn, "O gladsome Light," was sung by the choir with great expression. The fine, almost Wagnerian part, as I think it, of Elsie, was most effectively rendered in the introduction and subsequent scenes by Miss Anna Williams, while the equally attractive part of Ursula was no less artistically presented by Madame Marian McKenzie. The choral singing in the graceful setting of the lines "O pure in heart," as also in the Choral Epilogue, was everything that could be desired. Following "The Golden Legend" came Dr. Villiers Stanford's spirited setting of Tennyson's poem "The Revenge." The orchestra played with great spirit, and the choir, if not quite up to its usual standard, was fairly satisfactory throughout. Dr. Stanford's music was received with very marked expressions of favour, and the general feeling is that it will be always welcome.

The programme of the second Popular Concert included the Overture to "The Canterbury Pilgrims" (Stanford), two movements from Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony, and Dr. Hubert Parry's "Modern Suite"; also, in celebration of the hundredth anniversary of Carl Maria von Weber's birthday, that master's Overtures "Euryanthe" and "Jubel," and the Clarinet Concertino. The soloist in the last mentioned was Mr. James Clinton, of the orchestra, and Miss Carlotta Elliott was the vocalist of the evening.

Dr. Stanford, who took the place of Mr. Manns at this Concert, was entertained at dinner by the Glasgow Society of Musicians on the evening previous. The health of the distinguished guest was drunk with enthusiasm. In proposing "Prosperity to the Glasgow Society of Musicians," Dr. Stanford said that much might be done by such Societies in fostering local talent, and he recommended that every town of any size should, as it were, grow its own music and musicians; the great centres of the country should, too, possess orchestras of their own, and a National Opera House should be founded, as, the speaker said, had been suggested in Mr. Mackenzie's admirable and thoughtful address at Manchester. Dr. Stanford would, however, have preferred, he said, that this had preceded the establishment of great schools of musical instruction, as he feared that for some time the supply of musically educated persons would exceed the demand for their services in teaching or as performers.

The Glasgow Choral Union orchestra gave a performance in Greenock, on the 15th ult. There was a large audience. The Heckmann Quartet party was the chief attraction at a Concert given by the Paisley Choral Union on the 20th ult.

The leading attractions of the Choral Union Concerts of the 21st and 23rd ult. were Liszt's Concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 1, with Herr B. Stavenhagen as soloist; No. 2 of Beethoven's Symphonies, and a repetition performance of Dr. Stanford's Choral Ballad, "The Revenge."

A performance of Mr. F. Corder's new Cantata, "The Bridal of Triermain," was given by the Crosshill Musical Association, in the Burgh Hall, on the 23rd ult. The accompaniments were played on piano and harmonium, and gave a very fair idea of the orchestral effects. The chorus of fifty voices is a well trained one, and there was an efficient quartet of soloists. The result was a most creditable performance of this clever, picturesque, and original composition, which made an excellent impression on the large audience assembled, applause being frequent and hearty. The contralto solo (by Miss Alice Young), "In lofty hall," might perhaps be specially named. Mr. Alexander Patterson was the Conductor, Miss Alice Macdonald being at the piano, and Mr. George Hopper at the harmonium.

MUSIC IN SOUTH WALES.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THERE have been many interesting features in the local musical world during the past month or six weeks, and towards the end of this month—doubtless when this issue will be in the press—Oratorios, Eisteddfodau, and Concerts, will be held in abundance. Christmastide in South Wales promises, in fact, to be very musical.

The police bands at Swansea and Cardiff have lately attracted attention, and on the occasion of the annual Concert held by the former, a large audience attended. Among the vocalists were Mdlle. de Lido, Countess Sadowska, Mr. H. Jones, and Mr. Videon Harding, who were warmly received. Several selections were well rendered by the band.

The wishes of the audience at the last Concert of the Orchestral Society in regard to vocalists for their next Concert, on February 2, were ascertained by means of voting papers, which were distributed in the hall, and afterwards returned to the Society and stewards. It seems that Miss Mary Davies and Mr. Barrington Foote were selected by the majority of voters. Mr. Foote has been engaged consequently, but the lady had a London engagement for the same day, and Miss Hilda Wilson has been appointed to sing in her stead. There will be another Concert, on April 13, in connection with the same Society. Miss Davies has, I believe, been asked to sing at Cardiff on that occasion.

A prize of five guineas was offered by the Wrexham Festival Committee for the best setting of "Hands all round" (Lord Tennyson) as a part-song, and Mr. Tom Price (Merthyr) has been adjudicated the winner.

The Abercarn section of the South Wales Choral Union, numbering about seventy members, gave a performance of "St. Paul" on the 3rd ult. Mr. David Brown was the Conductor. The soloists were Miss Annie Bowen, Miss Lydia Dix, Mr. T. L. James, and Mr. F. J. Matthews; pianist, Mr. F. J. Liles (Newport); organist, Mr. G. Stephens (Ebbw Vale).

At the Lesser Park Hall, Cardiff, on the 8th ult., the third of a series of Concerts, under the auspices of South Wales University College, took place. The programme, which was rendered with ample justice in the presence of a large audience, was sustained by Dr. Shadwell (vocalist), Herr Peiniger (first violin), Mr. Percy Ould (second violin), Mr. Ellis Roberts (viola), Mr. Charles Ould (violoncello), and Professor Templeton (pianoforte). The selections included—Schumann's Quintet in E flat, Op. 44 (piano, violin, viola, and violoncello); Vocal Solo, "Liederkreis," Op. 98 (Beethoven); Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat, Op. 12; the songs "Forget me not" (Sterndale Bennett) and Hatton's "To Anthea"; and Mozart's Quartet in D minor (violins, viola, and cello).

On the 6th ult., at the Oddfellows' Hall, Dowlais, Fawcett's Oratorio "Paradise," was rendered in the presence of a large audience by the Elizabeth Street United Choir, assisted by Miss Marian Price, R.A.M., Miss Ruth Davies, Mr. E. Sandbrook, and Mr. J. Daniel; Conductor, Mr. Howell. The orchestral performers were supplied from Merthyr.

Two of the Saturday Popular Concerts at Cardiff have already been held, and Mr. Dodd, who originated the movement, has met with fair support. The first took place at the Park Hall, on the 11th ult., when some selections were rendered by a small choir only recently organised. The soloists were Mr. Arthur Castings, Madame Gertrude Lewis Phillips, and Signor Quaglia. Mr. Joseph Deacon was the accompanist.

Mr. Edward Lawrence, Organist and Choirmaster of St. David's, Merthyr, recently issued a report, from which it seemed he had received £317 12s. 2d. from all sources towards the Church Organ Improvement Fund. The instrument now contains about 2,000 pipes, 40 draw stops (including 6 couplers), 8 composition pedals, and swell pedal. The organ was redesigned by Mr. Lawrence himself, who has been the organist since 1860, and has collected altogether at different times nearly £600 for the purpose of enlarging and improving the instrument.

A large number of visitors were attracted to Mountain Ash on the occasion of an Eisteddfod, held on the 20th ult., in connection with the Norite Lodge, Blodewyn y Dyffryn. Mr. W. Abraham, the labour representative of the Rhondda in Parliament, being absent on business at Aberdare, the chair was taken by Mr. S. Shipton. The Conductor was the Rev. Benjamin Evans, Aberdare; musical adjudicator, Mr. Tom Price; literary judge, Rev. J. Howell; secretary, Mr. D. E. Coleman; and Miss Callaway accompanist. Mr. David Davies sang the Eisteddfod song "Hen Wlad fy Nhadau" ("Land of my Fathers"). For the best rendering of any song, the prize was divided between Miss Jesse Coleman, Mountain Ash, and Miss Polly Jones, Merthyr Vale, and a third was added for Miss M. A. Morris, Tonyrefail. Best rendering of "Dros y Gareg," Mrs. Ellis; second, Miss Polly Jones. "Myriads of Myriads," sung by children, resulted in the victory of a local choir—Bethlehem. Mr. Edwin Williams, the leader, received a silver medal. Vocal competition, "Hiraeth." Two competitors. Mr. D. Davies was awarded the prize. The chief choral competition was for a prize of £12 and a chair for the Conductor of the winning choir. Subject, "And it shall come to pass in the last days." Merthyr Vale and the Rhos (Mountain Ash) choirs competed, and the latter won. There was a Concert in the evening.

Mr. Morgan Morgan, the Mayor of Cardiff, has received a communication from Mr. C. Morley, Hon. Secretary of the Royal College of Music, on behalf of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, asking him to give every publicity to the open scholarships' programme for March next. It seems there will be fourteen scholarships—for composition (1), singing (5), piano (4), organ (1), violin (2), violoncello (1). Intending competitors must send in their names to the College on or before January 31, and preliminary examinations will be held on March 2 in various local centres.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, December 7, 1886.

In the American metropolis the occurrences in music which have excited most attention have been the representations of the German Opera Company at the Metropolitan Opera House, which had just commenced when I wrote my November letter. The enterprise has scored a series of successes, largely through the aid of Herr Albert Niemann, who astonished those familiar with him from performances witnessed in Germany by bringing to America a supply of voice which they had never had reason to set down among his possessions. We have long been accustomed to announcements of miraculous vocal recoveries just prior to the American débuts of European singers who had fallen into the sere and yellow leaf, and no one was inclined to credit the report that the German heroic tenor, who could scarcely be said to "sing" at all ten years ago, had actually regained a large portion of the voice of his youth, and was capable of delighting the ear with his music as well as the eye with his acting. Yet this was found to be the fact, and the fortunes of the season are thought to be so bound up in this singer that the management of the Court Opera at Berlin was appealed to for an extension of Herr Niemann's leave of absence, and he will remain here until the last week of the season, instead of returning to Berlin in January. It will be remembered that Fräulein Lehmann came from the Prussian capital in the same manner, and when denied an extension of her furlough, took it without leave. A similar performance on the part of Herr Niemann is not feared, for he is near the end of his artistic career, and looks forward to a handsome pension to which he will soon be entitled. The ambition which inspires Fräulein Lehmann he cannot feel at his age, and I am told that on the eve of his first American appearance he grew exceedingly nervous, and vainly questioned himself concerning his reasons for risking a failure in a strange country when his status was so delightfully comfortable in Berlin. His reception quieted all apprehensions, however, and he now labours with enthusiasm, and has appeared in "Die Walküre," "Der Prophet," "Tannhäuser," and "Tristan und Isolde." In the latter drama he achieved his most pronounced success, and its production will doubtless remain the most significant event of the season. The management was very apprehensive of the attitude of the public towards the work, and only yielded to the entreaties of Herr Seidl and the artists after long debate. The result was unexpectedly favourable. The first representation was so brilliant that the majority of the newspaper critics, who were in attendance on the Bayreuth Festival last summer, agreed that the interpretation at the Metropolitan was worthier of this work than that under the direction of Herr Mottl, in the Wagner Theatre. Fräulein Lehmann surpassed the finest of the many fine impersonations which she has placed to her credit, and her Isolde must surely rank with the most impassioned characters which the lyric stage of to-day can exhibit. Herr Niemann's Tristan was especially strong in the last act, for which he cleverly reserves his best powers. The stage decorations were handsome, though in no sense costly, and the orchestra performed prodigies of valour under the guidance of Herr Seidl. The leading musical critics of Boston came to witness the first representation, and reviewed it as extensively as they would have done had the performance taken place in their own city. Their compatriots in New York, having discussed the work with more or less intelligence and enthusiasm, have resolved to commemorate the event in a dinner, in honour of Herr Seidl, at which Herr Niemann will also be a guest. This dinner is set down for the 9th inst. Events at the Metropolitan Opera House were interesting, but less important have been the production of "Aïda," on a scale of great magnificence, and the first performance in America of Brüll's pretty little opera "The Golden Cross." The latter work is being used as introduction to the ballet "Vienna Waltzes," which is handsomely produced, but has failed to win popularity. "Aïda" was a somewhat disastrous venture for the Metropolitan management. Not less than £7,000 was spent on scenery and costumes, yet the opera has been withdrawn after four performances. The fault lay with the tenor, Zobel, who was unequal to the rôle of Rhadames. Herr Niemann, not wishing to sing the part (which he used to abuse in Berlin), and Herr Alvary not having the heroic style which it calls for, the only course open was to shelve the opera. This is the first severe blow that German opera has experienced since it was established three seasons ago.

The American Opera Company has suffered re-organisation, and is now known as the National Opera Company. The change is little else than nominal, although Mr. Theodore Thomas steps from the presidency of the old to the vice-presidency of the new corporation. The company began its season on November 15, in Philadelphia, and has since performed one week in Philadelphia, one week in Cincinnati, one week in St. Louis, and is now in Chicago. The patronage of the public has been generous in each city, the receipts averaging 30,000 dollars a week; but the expenses of the institution are so enormous that it is doubtful whether the season will be successful, even if the present rate of income is maintained. The operas that are being given are "Faust," "Huguenots," "Lakmé," "Orpheus," "Aïda," and Massé's one-act "Galathea." In addition, the ballets "Sylvia" and "Bal Costumé" are given. In Cincinnati and St. Louis the ballet feature, on which great stress is laid in the company's announcement, aroused the opposition of the clergy, and in the latter city there was an unfortunate controversy between Madame Fursch-Madi and Mr. Thomas, growing out of the rude behaviour to the prima donna of Hock, the German stage manager. Of course, the newspapers laid great stress on both affairs, with the usual result of giving the company the benefit of a great deal of gratuitous advertising.

In the two Concerts of the Philharmonic Society which have been given thus far, two new Symphonies were brought forward. The first, Anton Bruckner's Seventh in E major, made the most complete fiasco that the annals of music in New York show. At the public rehearsal, as well as at the Concert, fully two-thirds of the audience left the room after the second movement, the much-praised Adagio. I do not feel myself called on either to defend or criticise this act of public condemnation. I believe that Bruckner's Symphony is a serious work of greater interest and value than the public were able or willing to recognise, but I do not think its failure at all remarkable. The canons of taste which still guide our Concert audiences cannot accept this Symphony as beautiful music. The second novelty was of a different character. It was Tschaikowski's Symphony "after Byron's 'Manfred,'" and the public received it kindly. Nothing more brilliant in respect of orchestration can well be imagined than the work of the Russian composer in this Symphony.

Madame Patti's return was signalised by a success in four Concerts which exceeded the wildest expectations of the diva and her manager, and can only be accounted for on the theory that the inhabitants of adjoining cities came in great numbers, thinking it their last chance to hear the greatest vocalist of the age. It would not be excessive to estimate the receipts for the four Concerts at 30,000 dollars. Her Boston Concerts were almost equally remunerative. It is known now that Madame Patti is a partner in the enterprise with Mr. Henry E. Abbey. Curiosity is rife to hear of her reception in the City of Mexico, whose citizens crowded to a fraudulent sale of tickets, managed by a sharper, who represented himself as an agent for Mr. Abbey, and paid 20,000 dollars into the hands of the rogue, with nearly all of which he decamped.

Boston, having little else of magnitude to care for, is enjoying the Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra to the full. Mr. Gericke, the Conductor, has latterly resolved to take a hand in the American movement, and compositions of American composers are finding their way into his schemes. The next writer who will be thus honoured is Mr. Otto Floersheim, Editor of The Musical Courier of this city, whose orchestral morceau, entitled "Consolation," will be played this week. The munificent manner in which Mr. Higginson, who maintains the band, fulfils his self-imposed duty, can be read in the fact that he has resolved to buy fine violins for all those players in his orchestra who are obliged at present to use inferior instruments. Here is a musical Mæcenas indeed.

While waiting for the new operetta of Gilbert and Sullivan, Mr. Stetson, of the Fifth Avenue Theatre, revived "Princess Ida," but so vulgarized it by the interpolation of new scenes, dialogue, and songs that the lovers of the nice art of the admired English collaborators were rejoiced that the parody on Tennyson's "Princess" failed a second time. The German Liederkranz of this city recently performed Bruch's "Achilleus" for the first time in America.

THE admirable suitability of Gounod's "Mors et Vita" for church use and for the late Advent season especially, was well illustrated by its performance at the Church of St. Margaret Pattens, Rood Lane, on the 15th ult. (where it was also repeated on Sunday evening, the 19th and on the 22nd), when it was listened to with attentive reverence by large congregations. The work was given in English by the excellent choir of the Church up to the close of part one, with the utmost finish and care, the great and touching beauties of many portions of the "Requiem" being most impressively rendered by the soloists (to whom a special word of praise is due for their by no means easy task), Masters Ruddesham and Jarvis, and Messrs. Craddock, Edgar, Fairfax, Giles, and Darkin. The rest of the choir acquitted themselves with much efficiency in the remaining portions of the work, which, as is well known, needs the greatest care and skill for its proper interpretation. The organ (a new and most effective instrument by Messrs. Forster and Andrews of Hull) was the sole accompaniment, and the direction was, as usual, in the hands of Mr. Horace Buttery, who also presided at the organ. The work produced a marked effect upon the large audience.

AT Steinway Hall, on November 25, Mr. Edmund Rogers, Organist of St. Thomas's, Portman Square, gave an evening Concert, the programme consisting of his Cantatas "Footprints of the Saviour" and "The Pilgrim's Progress." For the admirable singing of the choir, which owes so much to Mr. Rogers's unceasing care, every praise is merited. The soloists were: Miss Margaret Hoare (who sang the soprano music with much skill and finish), Miss White, Miss Mary Morgan (who also rendered good service), Mr. Walter Howgate, and Mr. Lucas Williams (who gave the solos and declamations for the bass in a dignified and impressive manner). The efforts of Mr. Walter E. Stark (pianoforte) and Messrs. G. Belcher and C. A. Rogers (harmonium) must not be left unacknowledged, for to them much of the credit of a successful performance is due. The Cantatas and the composer (who conducted them) were enthusiastically received by a large audience.

THE Students' Concert and Prize Distribution in connection with the Croydon Conservatoire of Music was held in the Public Hall, Croydon, on Friday, the 17th ult., the Mayor presiding. An address was given by Sir George Macfarren, and Mr. G. F. Geaussent, the energetic Principal, spoke of the successful results attained by the Institution. The students who took part in the Concert were Mrs. Templeton, Miss Webster, Miss Alice Drayton, Miss Carter, and Miss Pyne, and the pupils of the Elocution Class, under the direction of Mr. Charles Fry, gave a Shakespearian Recital in costume, Miss Churchill, Miss Tombleson, Mr. Stockley, and Mr. F. Storey being specially worthy of mention.

At a Pianoforte Recital given by him on the 1st ult., at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, Mr. Henry Waller had set himself the formidable task of interpreting, from memory, a most diversified selection of classical pianoforte music, representing some seven composers, and including such veritable chevaux de bataille as Schubert's "Wanderer" Fantasia and Schumann's "Carnaval." If we add that the pianist went through his entire performance with unerring precision we have doubtless recorded a remarkable display of mnemonic and executive powers, and, as such, his efforts were duly appreciated by the audience. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Waller's æsthetical training has not kept pace with his mechanical one, and much indeed remains for him to accomplish in the former direction to render him a competent exponent of music of the higher order. We refer not merely to the absence in the present performance of the poetic element, but to the pianist's frequent misconception, if not absolute perversion, of his composers' meaning, wherein he betrays a lack of artistic culture which no amount of technical skill can effectually hide. To remedy so serious a defect should be the earnest endeavour of a pianist otherwise so painstaking and so accomplished.

The distribution of prizes to the successful students of the Hampstead Conservatoire of Music (Principal, Mr. G. F. Geaussent) took place at Prince's Hall on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult. The distribution was made by Sir Henry Holland, M.P., and subsequently Sir George Macfarren (who is President of the Institution) gave an address upon musical study in general. In congratulating the students on their success, he particularly pointed out the importance of insisting that all students should be made to pass the first examination in harmony before being allowed to take a prize. Sir James Linton also made a few observations respecting the Art School attached to the Conservatoire. The proceedings opened with a short Concert, in which Mrs. Halkett, Miss Webster, Miss Amy Carter, Miss Tombleson, and Miss Louisa Pyne (assisted by some professors of the Institution) took part, the last named lady receiving a well-merited recall for her rendering of the piano part in Schumann's Quartet (Op. 44). After the prizes were distributed, a Recital was given by the pupils of the Elocution Class, under the direction of Mr. Charles Fry, of a scene from "As You Like It," and created a very favourable impression.

At the Vestry Hall, Hampstead, on Thursday evening, the 9th ult., a new Oratorio, "Ruth," composed by Dr. Charles Vincent, and conducted by the composer, was given for the first time in London. Originally written as a kind of sacred opera, and intended for representation with costume and stage effects, it was found that insurmountable difficulties would prevent its performance in that shape, so, with certain slight modifications, it now takes the form of an Oratorio. The music is therefore somewhat lighter and simpler than is generally found in works of this class. The performance on Thursday night was in every respect most satisfactory. Madame Henrietta Tomlinson as Ruth, Miss Marianne Tomlinson as Naomi, and Mr. Maybrick as Boaz did ample justice to their respective parts, a choir of eighty well selected voices singing the choral portions. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection of vocal and instrumental music, in which, in addition to the artists already named, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Signor Luigi Meo, Mr. S. Midgley (of Bradford), and Mr. T. J. Grylls took part. The latter gentleman won much applause for his solo in the Oratorio.

On the 1st and 15th ult., in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Stroud Green, where the Rev. Robert Linklater has lately been appointed Vicar, two special Advent Services were held, consisting mainly of Spohr's "Last Judgment," rendered in its entirety with a full orchestra, and without the organ. This is the only instance, we believe, of this sublime work being given this year, in a church with a full orchestra and professional solo voices, and the effect was extremely impressive, the choruses, especially "Destroyed is Babylon," being sung with accuracy and vigour. The solos were entrusted to Miss Hare, Miss Marie Middleton (whose artistic rendering of her part was a decided feature in the Oratorio), Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Robert Hilton. The Precentor of the Church conducted.

The Annual Christmas Tree Festival of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, Upper Norwood, took place on the 20th ult., and was in every respect a brilliant success. In the selection from "The Messiah," the solos and choruses, especially "For unto us a child is born," were excellently rendered, Miss Campbell's charming soprano voice being heard to much advantage in the trying solo "Rejoice greatly." The efforts of the children were thoroughly appreciated in "Mother Goose," "Four-and-Twenty Blackbirds," "The House that Jack built," and indeed in all the juvenile scenes which were enacted, their graceful action being the theme of universal admiration. At the conclusion of the performance, the Principal, Dr. Campbell, stated that eleven students would take their certificates on the present occasion, and these, together with the certificates previously granted, would make sixteen for the present year. The earnings of pupils who had left the College during the past year would amount to about £10,000; and this fact he thought constituted the strongest claim for public support. In this we most cordially agree.

The following awards, after competitions, were made on Saturday, the 18th ult., at the Royal Academy of Music:—The Sainton-Dolby Prize (eighteen candidates), to Helen Saunders; the Bonamy Dobree Prize (four candidates), to John Carrodus, Jun.; and the Hine Gift (four candidates), to Corelli Windeatt. The competition for the Balfe Scholarship at the same Institution took place on Monday, the 20th. The examiners were Messrs. H. C. Lunn, Walter Macfarren, E. Prout, and the Principal (chairman). There were seven candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Arthur E. Godfrey. The competition for the Potter Exhibition also took place. The examiners were Messrs. H. C. Lunn, Walter Macfarren, E Prout, F. Westlake, and the Principal (chairman). There were eleven candidates and the exhibition was awarded to Ethel Boyce. The competition for the Westmoreland Scholarship took place on the 21st ult. The examiners were Messrs. F. R. Cox, Ettore Fiori, Manuel Garcia, F. Walker, and the Principal (chairman). There were nine candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Julia Neilson.

Mr. Stephen Kemp gave a very interesting Concert of Chamber Music on November 26, at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, assisted by Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant (violin), Mr. Oluf Svendsen (flute), and Mr. W. E. Whitehouse (violoncello). The solo performances of the Concert-giver comprised a very thoughtful reading of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in F minor (Op. 57), as well as some shorter pieces for the same instrument by Brahms, Chopin, Moszkowski, and the executant. Special thanks are due to Mr. Kemp for having included in the programme Weber's much neglected Trio for pianoforte, flute, and violoncello, in G minor (Op. 63), a work replete with melodious charm, of a pastoral character, and written for a most interesting, albeit no longer fashionable, combination of instruments. The Trio was rendered con amore by Messrs. Kemp, Svendsen, and Whitehouse. Spohr's Pianoforte Trio in F (Op. 123), in which Mdlle. Vaillant ably sustained the violin part, concluded the proceedings. Miss Damian was the vocalist, and Mr. Ernest Ford an efficient accompanist.

The members of the St. George's Glee Union gave their 214th consecutive monthly Concert on the 3rd ult., in the Pimlico Rooms, Warwick Street. The solo artists were Madame Wilson Osman, Miss Annie Dwelley, Mr. Charles Copland, and Mr. Alec Marsh. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous, and the second was devoted to Sir Arthur Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea," the characters being most ably represented by Madame Wilson Osman and Mr. Alec Marsh. The chorus-singing throughout was exceptionally good. Mr. F. R. Kinkee presided at the pianoforte, Mr. T. G. Baines at the harmonium, and Mr. Joseph Monday conducted.

On St. Andrew's Day a performance of Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" was given at St. Andrew's Church, Ashley Place, S.W., with full orchestral accompaniment. The solos were sung by Master Lewis (Temple Church) and Messrs. J. H. Crosland and Thornton Colvin in a very effective manner. The choruses were given with great precision. Dr. C. W. Pearce presided at the organ, and Mr. Wm. Hatch conducted.

THE Westminster Orchestral Society, having now satisfactorily established its raison d'être among London Concert institutions, inaugurated its second season with a Concert, given on the 8th ult., at the Westminster Town Hall. Among the specially interesting features of the programme provided on this occasion, we may refer to a new orchestral piece entitled "Song without words," cleverly and effectively written by Mr. C. G. Godfrey, and to the very able playing, on the part of Miss Dora Bright, of Mr. Walter Macfarren's "Concertstück," for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniment, which was conducted by the composer. Nor should we omit to mention Mr. Frederic W. Griffiths's effective rendering of the solo part of Mr. J. F. Barnett's "Concerto Pastorale," for flute and orchestra. In these, as in other more familiar numbers, the band, consisting of amateur and professional musicians, under the conductorship of Mr. Charles S. Macpherson, was highly efficient. The next public Concert of the Society is announced to take place on February 16.

THE Tufnell Park Choral Society held its Christmas performance in St. George's Room, on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult., when Mendelssohn's "Christus" was ably rendered, the solos being taken by Mr. Kent Sutton. The novelty of the evening was Mr. Corder's Cantata "The Bridal of Triermain." In the choral introduction, "Where is the maiden," the singers fully expressed the original ideas of the author, and afterwards supporting the principals in the movement "In days e'en minstrels, now forget," carried on the recital of the "Legend" in a very interesting manner. Not less impressive were they in the section where the solo bass, leading the strain "Long shall close in stony sleep," is followed by the choir in unison. Between the first and second parts, songs were rendered by Miss Nellie Potter, Mr. Melnott, and Mr. Maybrick, and these, in the soli of the Cantata, gave place to Miss Bailey, Miss Stephenson, Mr. Kent Sutton, and Messrs. A. and J. Pusy, the accompanist being Mr. Frank Lewis Thomas, and the Conductor Mr. W. Henry Thomas.

AN Organ Recital was given by Mons. Alex. Guilmant at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, on Thursday, the 9th ult. His programme included Liszt's Prelude and Fugue on B-A-C-H, Bach's Toccàta in F, and his own "Méditation sur le Stabat Mater," Caprice in B flat, and "Offertoire sur trois Noëls." His masterly performance was greatly enjoyed, and his wonderful improvisation on a theme (Adeste Fideles) selected by the Organist of the Church provoked admiring comments from everyone present. Miss Meredyth Elliott contributed two sacred songs in her usual impressive manner, and the choir of the Church sang two Advent anthems, "Hearken unto Me, My people" (Sullivan) and "Hosanna in the Highest" (Stainer.) The Rev. Newman Hall, LL.B., conducted the introductory and closing services, and the vocal music was accompanied by Mr. J. R. Griffiths, Organist and Director of the Choir.

A Concert was given in the Kensington Town Hall, on November 29th, under the patronage of the Hon. and Rev. Carr and Lady Mary Glynn, on behalf of the Postman's Seaside Rest and Convalescent Home, Brighton. The hall was crowded. The artists who took part were Madame Minnie Gwynne, Miss Agnes Liddell, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Alfred J. Layton, vocalists, whose contributions of songs, duets, and quartets met with hearty approval. The instrumentalists were—pianoforte, Miss Lily von Kornatzki; violin, Miss Rose Lynton; harp, Miss Ida Audain. Mr. Pritchard and Mr. Ernest Walcot gave some humorous musical sketches, much to the delight of the audience. Mrs. A. J. Layton, F.C.O., and Mr. Barrow Dowling accompanied.

IT is with sincere regret that we record the death of Dr. E. T. Chipp, for many years the well known and highly esteemed Organist of Ely Cathedral. Dr. Chipp had been for some time past in failing health, and since the middle of September had been seeking restoration in rest and change. During the first week of December he left England for the South of France, and had reached Nice, where he suddenly expired in the early morning of the 17th ult., to the great grief of his family and a large circle of friends. Dr. Chipp's eminent abilities placed him in the first rank of Organists, and his loss will be widely deplored.

THE first Concert for the season of the Finsbury Choral Association took place at Holloway Hall, on Thursday, the 9th ult. The works given were A. R. Gaul's "The Holy City" and W. H. Cummings's "The Fairy Ring." The principals were Miss Clara Samuell, Miss Emily Davies, Madame Isabel Fassett, Mrs. W. J. Davey, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. W. G. Forington, all of whom met with much favour from the large audience. The choir sang the choruses with vigour and precision. Mr. J. P. Harding was at the piano, and Mr. E. H. Lemare (in place of Mr. Marchment, absent through indisposition) at the harmonium. Mr. Lockwood (harp) and Messrs. T. Harper and J. Solomon (trumpets) contributed to the effect. Mr. Dale conducted "The Holy City," and Mr. Cummings conducted his own Cantata.

THE Annual Concert of the Violin Classes at the City of London College, under the direction of Mr. W. Fitzhenry, took place on Thursday, the 16th ult. The members of the classes played a Quartet by Tolhurst, a selection by S. Jarvis, entitled "Scotland," encored, and a selection from "Lucrezia Borgia," the execution of all of which testified to the successful training they had received. Mr. T. E. Gatehouse played as violin solos a Fantasie by Alard on "La Traviata," and a Fantasia on "Mosè in Egitto," by Paganini, for one string only. Both pieces were excellently rendered, and enthusiastically encored. The vocalists, Madame Raymond, Mr. Hulbert L. Fulkerson, Mr. Kift, and Mr. Frank Ward, were well received in their respective solos.

ON Sunday afternoon, the 19th ult., an excellent Recital of music was given at St. George's Church, Camberwell. The artists were Miss Haldane, R.A.M., Mr. Joseph Heald, R.A.M., and Mr. H. A. Chapman, supported by the church choir and an orchestra. The programme included an Aria, by J. S. Bach, "Rock of Faith" (given for the first time in this country), in which the solo for "Viole d'amore" was finely rendered by Herr Carli Zoeller. G. A. Holmes's "Colonial and Indian March" was also performed by organ and orchestra very effectively, and a Fantasia, by Carli Zoeller, for violins and organ, upon the Sicilian Hymn "O Sanctissima," was much appreciated. Herr Carli Zoeller conducted, and Mr. G. Augustus Holmes, Organist of the Church, presided at the organ.

MR. CHARLES DOWDESWELL (joint Hon. Sec. of the London Wagner Society) delivered the first of a course of four Lectures upon Richard Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung," to the Surrey Conservatoire of Music, at Clapham, on the 14th ult. In addition to an examination of the dramatic, musical, and philosophical sides of the trilogy, the course will comprise an analysis of the Norse Eddas, and Sagas, and German legends to which the master resorted when writing the poem. At the first Lecture vocal and instrumental illustrations from "The Rhinegold" were admirably rendered by the Misses Leighton, Van Breydel, and Buckland, Messrs. Hoefler, Dowdeswell, Tapley, and McPherson. The next Lecture, on the 18th inst., will treat of "The Valkyrie."

THE first Convocation of Trinity College University, Toronto, for the purpose of conferring degrees in music, was recently held in the Convocation Hall. Prayers having been said in Latin by the Provost, the degree of Bachelor of Music was conferred, with the usual formalities, upon the Rev. William Roberts, of Amherst Island; Miss Gregory, of Hamilton; and Miss Mellish, of Caledonia. At the conclusion of the ceremony, the Hon. G. W. Allan, Chancellor, addressed the assembly, and expressed his gratification at admitting lady graduates within the walls of the University for the first time.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," Gounod's "De profundis," and Spohr's "Last Judgment" in St. Bride's Church, on the 1st ult. The soloists were Miss Clara Hoschke, Miss Isabel Tomalin, Mr. Henry Yates, and Mr. James Blackney. The same works were sung by the Choir in Whitechapel Parish Church on the 8th ult., when the principal vocalists were Mrs. Livesay Carrott, Mrs. Dean, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. James Blackney. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

MDLLE. ROSINA ISIDOR gave an evening Concert on the 4th ult., at St. James's Hall, with the co-operation of a number of artists occupying high rank in the profession. Among the solo performances of the Concert-giver may be specially instanced her fine delivery of the air "Figlio del Sol," from Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," the lady being also associated with Mr. Santley in an admirable rendering of the ever popular duet "La ci darem," from "Don Giovanni." Vocal solos were also rendered by Madame Enriquez, Mr. H. Kearton, and Mr. A. Borrows; MM. Werner, Tito Mattei, and Bottesini being the solo instrumentalists. The audience, as is customary on such occasions, testified to the exuberance of their enthusiasm by insisting upon an inordinate number of "encores."

THE fourth Annual Concert of the Violin Classes of the South London Institute of Music, under the direction of Mr. W. Fitzhenry, took place on the 22nd ult. The members of the Classes acquitted themselves well in a Quartet by Tolhurst, a selection, "Scotland," by S. Jarvis, and a selection from "Lucrezia Borgia," the Advanced Class being especially good in De Beriot's "Scène de Ballet." The violin solos of Mr. T. E. Gatehouse, including "Fantaisie sur Mosè in Egitto" for fourth string only, by Paganini, were excellently played and well received. The vocalists were Madame Reichelmann, Miss Edith Stuart, Mr. J. H. Mullerhausen, and Mr. Alfred Grieve; solo bassoon, Mr. Mendelssohn Hargreaves; Mr. W. H. Harper presided at the pianoforte.

A CONCERT was recently given in the Corn Exchange, Watford, in aid of a testimonial fund to Mr. Henry Baumer, late head master of the Watford School of Music, and principal of the London School of Music, who has now, through ill-health, been compelled to retire from his profession. The artists were Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Bernard Lane, Mr. W. H. Brereton, Herr A. Kummer, Madame Frickenhaus, and Mr. Charles Marshall. Miss Anna Williams was announced to sing, but was unable to attend through indisposition, her place being taken by Madame Wilson Osman. Mr. Santley, who was prevented from taking part on account of a former engagement, sent a donation of five guineas to the fund.

THE first Concert (fifth season) of the North-East London Choral Society was given in the Morley Hall, Hackney, on the 8th ult. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and Handel's "Acis and Galatea." The principal vocalists were Misses Ada Patterson, Anna C. Smith, and Emilie Lloyd; Messrs. Sidney Tower and Thurley Beale. Accompanists, Mr. L. B. Prout (pianoforte) and Mr. Fountain Meen (harmonium); Conductor, Mr. John E. West. The whole performance was excellent, the choruses being particularly noticeable for expression. The soloists were highly successful, and the admirable rendering of the lyrics in "Athalie," by Mr. Charles Fry, formed a special feature of the Concert.

THE West London Male Voice Union gave a Smoking Concert (the first of the third season) at the Athenæum, Shepherd's Bush, on the 2nd ult. The choir rendered Paxton's "How sweet, how fresh," Spofforth's "Come, bounteous May," Blumenthal's "Shall I, wasting in despair," and a charming setting of Heine's "To the Rose," by Mr. Albert Reakes, the Conductor, in a highly efficient manner. Mr. Albert Reakes's singing of "The Raft" (Pinsuti), and a "Hunting song" (Bending), the latter accompanied by the composer, created a furore. Mr. Engel's cello solos, and Mr. G. Bending's pianoforte solos, elicited great applause from an audience which filled the hall.

THE Aubert Orchestral Band gave its second Concert on Thursday, the 9th ult., at the Warlters Road Schoolroom, Camden Road, Holloway. This amateur band, which was started only twelve months ago, has, under the able instruction of its Conductor, Mr. F. Hall, attained a high degree of efficiency, and all the instrumental selections were exceedingly well played. Miss Gerrans executed two violin solos, entitled "Méditations" and "Danse Fantastique," in a highly finished style, and the principal vocalists, Miss Emmie Hare, Mr. F. Hyatt, and Mr. H. C. Newton, were well received. Mr. F. W. Howland gave complete satisfaction by the manner in which he played an organ solo.

MARYLEBONE Parish Church has made admirable use of its large choir during Advent in rendering Spohr's "Last Judgment" on each Thursday evening. Mr. Laurence Fryer, of St. Paul's, was engaged for the tenor solos, though, through unavoidable absence, he was on one occasion replaced by Mr. Reginald Groome, who seems to have a perfect conception of the part. The warmest praise is due to Mr. William Hodge for his excellent organ playing, his rendering of the Symphony at the commencement of the second part, especially, being a marvel of technical skill. St. Marylebone is, indeed, fortunate in securing as Precentor one who has had his training from such a master as Dr. Stainer.

WE are requested to state that a dinner of the "Old Boys" of St. Paul's Cathedral will be held on Saturday, the 8th inst., at which the chair and vice-chair will be taken by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Henry Gadsby respectively, both "Old Boys" of the Cathedral. A long list of names since the year 1845 has been obtained, but the addresses of many cannot be procured, and any "Old Boys," therefore, who may be ignorant of the approaching banquet, will much oblige by communicating immediately with the Secretary, Mr. George F. Grover, 258, Kennington Road, Kennington Cross, S.E.

THE Stock Exchange Orchestral Society gave the first Concert of its present (fourth) season on the 9th ult., at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, when the programme included, as its leading feature, so important a work as Beethoven's Symphony in D major, the second of the famous nine written by that composer. The Society possesses a full orchestra, composed of members of the Stock Exchange, and some few professionals, who, under the able direction of Mr. George Kitchin, are doing some really good work in the direction of a more general cultivation of high class music.

A CONCERT was given, on the 17th ult., by the students and professors of the Hyde Park Academy of Music for Ladies, at the Beethoven Rooms, Harley Street. There was a well-chosen programme, the first part being miscellaneous, while the second was devoted to a very creditable performance of Reinecke's clever and tuneful Cantata "Cinderella." The solo parts in the latter were sung by the Misses Lottie Wilde, Janet Tatham, and Nina and Constance Dieseldorff, Mrs. Rossi Moreton reciting the story. Mr. H. F. Frost conducted.

THE presentation of an illuminated address on vellum and a massive gold hunter watch, to Dr. Stainer, took place on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult., at the Cannon Street Hotel. The presentation was made by Mr. H. Brandreth Gibbs, on behalf of the Committee and members of the London Male Voice Club (Männergesangverein), the occasion being the resignation of the post of Conductor to the club, which Dr. Stainer has held since 1873. A Smoking Concert took place on the same evening, at which between 300 and 400 members were present, and Mr. Eaton Faning conducted.

AN exceedingly fine performance of Beethoven's Mass in C and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given by the Borough of Hackney Choral Association at the Shoreditch Town Hall on the 13th ult. The rendering of the choral and instrumental portions of both works could not well have been better. Mr. John Probert, a new tenor, appeared to conspicuous advantage in the "Lobgesang." He has a charming voice, and he uses it like an artist. The other soloists were Mrs. Mason, Miss Mary Chamberlain, and Mr. Frederick Bevan.

WE record with much regret the death of Mr. T. J. Sullivan, a Professor in the Cork School of Music since the foundation of that Institution, and for over thirty years Organist at the Dominican Church of St. Mary. His efficiency as a choirmaster and his ability as a teacher were well known and highly appreciated, and his loss will be long and deeply felt.

WE are requested to state that Mr. H. W. Newstead has resigned his appointment as Organist of Clifton Congregational Church, an office he has held for nine years, and that he has been presented with a handsome musical cabinet and silver testimonial by the members of the Clifton Choir and Musical Association.

WITH a view to the convenience of students residing in remote places, the authorities of Trinity College, London, have decided to institute Correspondence Classes in the various subjects of the Matriculation and Further Arts Examinations preliminary to the Higher Musical Diplomas of the College, under the superintendence of the Director of the Literature and Science Department, Mr. G. W. Bloxam, M.A., who will be happy to answer any enquiries addressed to him by persons wishing to avail themselves of the new regulation.

MR. H. W. WESTON, A.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster of Balham Parish Church, gave an Organ Recital on the 12th ult., at St. Nicholas' Cole Abbey, at the 4 p.m. Lecture, assisted by Miss Blanche Weston, who sang Rodney's "Calvary" and Pinsuti's "Nightless Land." The organ pieces included Mendelssohn's Third Organ Sonata, and works by Merkel, Tours, &c. Owing to the success of the present course of Lectures, it is proposed to continue them after Christmas.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given on Saturday evening, the 18th ult., in the schoolroom, St. Andrew's, Lambeth, under the direction of Mr. H. Randall, Organist of the Church. The programme, which was miscellaneous, was well rendered, the special features being the singing of Mr. Thurley Beale and the pianoforte playing of Miss Day. The other artists were Mrs. Carter, Miss Dickson, Mr. W. L. Bryant, Mr. F. Bartlett, and Masters Roe and Astell. Mr. A. F. W. Humm accompanied.

MDLLE. KLEEBERG gave her second Pianoforte Recital at the Prince's Hall on Wednesday, the 8th ult., and was more fortunate than on the previous occasion, the hall being well filled. The principal items in her programme were Beethoven's Sonata in F minor (Appassionata) and Chopin's Sonata in B minor (Op. 58). In both of these, but especially in Beethoven's work, she again evinced that increasing power and energy which we noticed at her first Recital.

A MOST successful Concert was given at Hackney Downs by the boys and masters of the Grocers' Company Schools on the 20th ult., when Edmund Rogers's Cantata "Beauty and the Beast" was performed, as the second part of a miscellaneous programme, which also included a part-song by the School Organist (R. T. Gibbons), entitled "A Christmas song," and selections by the school band. Mr. J. A. Worthington conducted, and Mr. Gibbons presided at the organ and pianoforte as occasion required.

A CONCERT was given by the Students of the Highbury and Islington Organ School and College of Music, at the Highbury Athenæum, on the 10th ult., the large hall being crowded. The Rev. E. A. Stuart, M.A., Vicar of St. James's, Holloway, occupied the chair. Miss Berrie Stephens, R.A.M., the Conductor and Principal, is to be congratulated upon the well deserved success she and her pupils obtained.

A MEETING of the London Church Choir Association was held on November 29 at the Choir Vestry of St. Vedast, Foster Lane, the Rev. Dr. Sparrow Simpson presiding. Resolutions were passed that the Association should be continued, and that it be primarily diocesan, with power to admit choirs within the Metropolitan area. The Rev. W. Russell, Succentor of St. Paul's, was elected President, and Dr. Martin Conductor.

SPOHR'S Oratorio "The Last Judgment," was sung at St. John's, Waterloo Road, on Thursday evenings, the 2nd, 9th, and 16th ult., under the direction of the Organist, Mr. Henry J. B. Dart. The weekly Organ Recitals have been given on the Tuesday evenings in December, by Messrs. Dart, Tunstall, and W. G. Wood.

DURING Miss Agnes Zimmermann's recent visit to Germany she had the honour of playing to H.R.H. the Comtesse de Flandre, at Brussels. The Comtesse expressed her pleasure at Miss Zimmermann's playing by presenting her with a handsome brooch, set with diamonds, sapphires, and pearls.

AN ad eundem Degree of Doctor in Music has been conferred by the University of Trinity College, Toronto, upon Dr. Charles W. Pearce, who holds a similar degree (by examination) in the University of Cambridge.

THE usual fortnightly Smoking Concert was given on the 11th ult., at the Camberwell, Peckham, and Dulwich Conservative Club, when the following gentlemen contributed to the programme—Messrs. Henry Taylor, Edward Dalzell, R. W. Heney, F. H. Cozens, F. Bevan, Donnell Balfe, and Thurley Beale. Violin solos were given by Mr. C. Schalsky, and Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock conducted. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. C. H. Schofield.

AN excellent performance of "St. Paul" was given at New Court Chapel, on the 17th ult., by the New Court Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Thomas Bound. Miss Dearden accompanied, and the soloists were Miss Annie Matthews, Mrs. W. J. Davey, Mr. Edwin Bryant, and Mr. Frank May. The choruses were rendered with precision and effect.

AT the Christmas Terminal Examination of the Royal College of Music, the following awards were made:—The Hopkinson Gold Medal for pianoforte playing, Marmaduke M. Barton, of Leeds, holder of the Elizabeth Pringle Scholarship. Council Exhibitions: £15 to Arthur R. Blagrove (violoncello); £20 to Rose E. Price (singing) and Lucy H. Stone (violin), conjointly.

SPOHR'S "Last Judgment" was given at Clapham Congregational Church, on Wednesday, the 8th ult. The solos were rendered by Masters W. Redfern, H. Humm, and E. Lewis, and Messrs. Joseph Tapley and Thomas Kempton. The choir numbered fifty boys and men. Mr. J. P. Attwater, A.C.O., presided at the organ, and Mr. Clement Colman conducted.

ON the 18th ult. a performance of "The Messiah" was given in the Rupert Road Hall, by the Choral Society in connection with Upper Holloway Baptist Chapel. The soloists were Mrs. C. Harrison, Miss Edith M. Stephens, Mr. Tom Maude, and Mr. James Blackney. The Organist, Mr. E. Davidson Palmer, Mus. Bac., Oxon., accompanied, and Mr. F. Robins conducted.

A PERFORMANCE of Schumann's "Advent Hymn" was given at St. Jude's Church, South Kensington, on Tuesday, the 21st ult., by the St. Jude's Choral Society, assisted by members of the choir. Mr. B. Harwood, M.A., Mus. Bac., presided at the organ, and Mr. R. Morgan Tamplin, B.A., conducted. During Advent Mr. Tamplin has given a series of Organ Recitals at the same church.

WE are informed that Mr. Frank Austin, L.Mus. T.C.L., has relinquished the post of Organist and Choirmaster of St. Mark's, Myddleton Square, which he has held for nine years. During this period many standard musical works have been performed by the voluntary choir, including Weber's "Jubilee Cantata," &c., and the general standard of the choral services has been much improved.

DR. BRADFORD'S fifth Terminal Organ Recital took place at the Royal Naval School, New Cross, on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult. The programme was varied and well chosen, consisting almost exclusively of high class classical music. Dr. Bradford was assisted by Miss Edith M. Coldwell (pianoforte), Mr. James Terry (violin), and the choirs of the Royal Naval School and St. Luke's, Charlton.

As now arranged, Mr. Leslie Crotty and Madame Georgina Burns (Mrs. Crotty) will not leave Mr. Carl Rosa for another year. They will then head the Georgina Burns Opera Company in a provincial tour, under the management of Mr. T. Robertson. Report states that the new enterprise will start with an original work, and an English adaptation of a French classic.

MR. FRANCIS CUNNINGHAM WOODS, of St. Mary Hall, Oxford, and late Organist of Brasenose College, has been appointed Organ Scholar of Exeter College, Oxford, in succession to Mr. A. H. Brewer, lately appointed Organist of St. Michael's, Coventry.

FOUR thousand people attended the performance of sacred music in Gloucester Cathedral, at which Dean Butler was present for the last time. Our readers will be glad to learn that Dean Spence is quite in sympathy with the "new departure."

THE stage rehearsals of the new Gilbert-Sullivan Opera began on the 15th ult. As usual, the secrets of the Savoy are well kept, but we hear rumours of a splendid spectacle in the second act.

REVIEWS.

The Triumph of Victoria. Madrigal for five voices. The words and music by J. Stainer.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN advance of the flood of music which will doubtless set in to celebrate this, the Jubilee year of the Queen's reign, we have here a five-part Madrigal, composed by an artist whose talent and position sufficiently entitle him to be acknowledged as "Composer Laureate" on an occasion of national rejoicing. More especially in a composition of this kind there is always a slight sensation of working in fetters when setting the verses of one who, however good he may be as a poet, is not himself a musician; and we are glad, therefore, to find that Dr. Stainer has, in this Madrigal, supplied his own words, which we may here say are thoroughly reflective of the feeling of the people, and admirably suited for singing in large public assemblies. The music—scored for two soprani, alto, tenor and bass—has all the bold simplicity which should characterise national compositions, combined with that true flavour of the Madrigal which appeals to all music-loving Englishmen, and most appropriately recalls the day when, in these works, the virtues of a former English Queen were glorified by the native composers of her reign. The broad diatonic harmonies throughout the composition, the several interesting points of imitation, and the sympathetic colouring of the words, will certainly make it a general favourite; and we conscientiously recommend it, not only as a worthy musical tribute to a Sovereign who for fifty years has reigned in the hearts of her subjects, but as a valuable contribution to the repertory of choral music, which will be heard with pleasure long after the event which called it forth has passed away.

Novello's Services of Sacred Song. Scenes from the lives of Abraham, Moses, Elijah, and Daniel.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE Services of Song are part of a series which Messrs. Novello are bringing out, under the editorship of Dr. Troutbeck of Westminster Abbey. The first service is by the Editor, the second by Archdeacon Farrar, the third by the Rev. R. F. Dale, formerly one of the Assistant Masters in Westminster School, the fourth by the Rev. A. Gerald Bowman, Vicar of St. Andrew's, Westminster. These numbers are already published. They will shortly be followed by one on St. John the Baptist, and another on St. John the Evangelist, by the Rev. H. A. Cotton and the Rev. E. Price, Minor Canons of Westminster. A seventh service, by Mr. Brammall, compiled before this series was projected, has been adopted into it. The main features of these services of song are those of similar services which have already been published by the Sunday School Institute and others. Services of song at first found favour chiefly among Nonconforming churches, simplicity, elasticity, and picturesqueness being among their most prominent characteristics. There is in a service of song some resemblance to an oratorio. The subject is usually Scriptural, often biographical, and description is interspersed with reflections and direct teaching. For the sake of those (we hope they are few) to whom services of song are yet unknown, we may point out that the descriptive portions are generally in the form of readings selected from the Scriptures, taking the place of the narrative portions of the oratorio, leading up to appropriate and suggestive hymns, songs, or choruses, which answer to the choral numbers of the oratorio. In the series before us the most striking and noteworthy scenes in the lives of the four Old Testament saints have been chosen, and are described and illustrated in the manner indicated above. The tunes are chiefly, though not exclusively, taken from the Hymnary, and not only well-known hymns, but hymns as yet but little known, and others newly written, as well as new tunes, have been introduced. We take this occasion of remarking how convenient an opportunity is given by the getting up of a service of song to teach the children of a parish fresh hymns and tunes, and so to help to add to the general stock of both. We would also call our readers' attention to the power of compression which is given by the sub-division into scenes. Should any service appear to be too long as a whole, selections from it can easily be made, without giving a sense of mutilation. It is scarcely necessary to add that in accuracy, clearness of type, attractive appearance, and let us also specify cost, these services leave little to be desired.

The Hygiene of the Vocal Organs. A Practical Handbook for Singers and Speakers. Second Edition. By Morell Mackenzie, M.D., Lond. [Macmillan and Co.]

WHEN so eminent a member of the Medical profession as Dr. Mackenzie offers to the world the result of very many years of practical experience upon the hygiene of the vocal organs, not only those engaged in teaching singing and elocution should diligently read and study his remarks, but the general public may materially benefit by his sound advice upon the true method of using and preserving the voice. "Now-a-days," says our author, in his introductory observations, "the supreme importance of hygiene is universally allowed, and the goddess of health-preservation bids fair to take precedence of her father, Æsculapius the healer. In other words, the sanitary engineer is abroad and threatens to displace the doctor." Assuredly, it is better to ward off diseases than to endeavour to cure them after they are contracted. As Dr. Mackenzie observes, "the right use of the voice is the chief factor in the maintenance of its quality"; and we are convinced that if the precepts so lucidly laid down in this book are rigidly followed, the vocal organs may through a long life be kept in a fairly healthy condition. One attraction in this work is that in no respect does its author intrude upon the ground of the artistic teacher: "I have no pretension," he says, "to speak with authority as a musician or even as a physiologist, and in the following pages I do not profess either to teach singing or elocution, or to throw new light upon the obscurer problems of voice-production. Matters belonging to either of these provinces are dealt with only in their relation to the well-being and functional efficiency of the vocal organs. That is a subject on which I may, with less presumption, claim a hearing." As a friend, then, to the vocal professor, Dr. Mackenzie may be freely consulted; and a careful perusal of his book has proved to us how profitable will be the result. It need scarcely be said that the anatomy of the vocal organs is described with remarkable clearness; and before explaining what takes place in the larynx whilst the voice is being produced, an excellent account of the structure and use of the laryngoscope is given. By means of this wonderful little instrument its real inventor, Manuel Garcia, succeeded in seeing his own larynx, and watching its movements in respiration, in the formation of vowels, and in singing. In detecting disease Dr. Mackenzie is of opinion that the laryngoscope is invaluable; but that it has added little to our knowledge of the physiology of the larynx. This may, of course, be because so much was known of it before; but if only as an aid to the treatment of disease, it is impossible to over-estimate its importance. The chapter on the singing voice contains an admirable exposition of the "Registers"—a subject which our author truly tells us has called "combative professors to battle like a trumpet"—and several illustrations of the male and female glottis in the act of producing high and low notes, as viewed through the laryngoscope, are given. In the observations upon the training of the singing voice, the author makes some excellent suggestions as to the selection of a teacher, giving us, as a tolerably safe rule for the guidance of pupils, or their parents and guardians, the testing of a master's power of imparting good instruction by actual results. Do those who have studied with him sing well? and do their voices last? In the choosing of a pianoforte, we should say, do the instruments of this maker emit a good tone? and do they wear well? but if people will decide without such enquiry in either case, they should not expect sympathy when they find that they are grossly deceived. In treating of "vocal gymnastics," Dr. Mackenzie says: "Frequent short exercises in respiration should be carried out both in the erect and in the recumbent position. In standing, the body should be held upright, the head kept erect, but not thrown back; the act should be performed naturally, without flurry or violence, and at regular intervals, care being taken that the collar-bone does not rise to any perceptible extent whilst the lungs are being expanded.

Those who, from weakness or slovenly carriage of the body, habitually stoop, or let their limbs hang with a too æsthetic limpness, will find it advantageous to commence their breathing exercises whilst lying on the back. Both inspiration and expiration should be practised." This is valuable advice, and should be rigidly followed by all, at least, who make exceptional use of their vocal organs. The chapter on "The care of the formed voice" is one of the most important in the book, and cannot be too much commended to vocalists. "It need hardly be said," writes our author, "that the voice must not be abused, either by being forced beyond its natural compass or by excessive violence of production. If the strings of a fiddle are screwed up too tight they will snap, and severe physical injury to the vocal organs may be the consequence of straining the voice beyond the limits of its capacity. Loss of elasticity of the vocal cords from over-stretching, rupture of some of the muscular or ligamentous fibres, or even of a blood-vessel in the throat, paralysis of one or more of the laryngeal muscles, are some of the ways in which nature occasionally avenges too rough handling of her delicate machinery." A chapter headed "Special Hygiene for Singers" contains valuable hints on temperance, clothing, diet, exercise, and many other matters absolutely necessary to be carefully studied by vocalists. "Women," it is said, "should walk out not less than three, and men not less than six miles a day. The dread of taking cold through the feet is unfounded if people will only consent to wear boots of sufficient thickness." The necessity of training the speaking voice is also very properly enforced, and singing as a help to speaking well, not of course, as Dr. Mackenzie says, that he would wish "to add to the afflictions of life by letting loose on society a host of tuneless minstrels," but simply that all may speak freely and with a clear articulation.

It is a great merit in this book that the author rather builds up theories of his own than attempts to demolish the theories of others. Temperately, and with admirable clearness of style, he writes the result of his own practice upon some of the best known vocalists; a table, showing the shape of the glottis and condition of the vocal cords in singing, being given in the Appendix, which we are certain will be studied with much interest. In every respect the work is an invaluable contribution to the physiologist and musician, and most thoroughly fulfils its mission as a "Handbook for Singers and Speakers."

Fifty Lessons for the Medium Part of the Voice. Forty Lessons for Contralto. Forty Lessons for Bass or Baritone. By J. Concone. Edited, with Marks of Expression and Phrasing, by Alberto Randegger.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE are glad to find that so distinguished a Professor as Mr. Randegger has so far recognised the inestimable value of "Concone's Lessons" as to supervise these editions just issued, and to add to their usefulness by indicating the method in which they are to be practised. After stating that no edition yet published seems to him as correct, complete, and reliable as it should be, Mr. Randegger says: "I have endeavoured to rectify this deficiency by adding in the present edition signs of expression and phrasing, where I considered it expedient to do so, completing, and in some cases altering, the breathing marks, and altogether carefully revising the whole work." The author expressly tells us that the object of these Lessons is to "place and fix the voice accurately," and to "develop taste while singing broad, elegant, and rhythmical melodies." Twenty-five of the Lessons are intended to be sung as Solfeggi, viz., pronouncing on every note its corresponding Italian name (do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, si), and fifteen are to be vocalised, viz., sung upon the broad and open sound of the Italian vowel A (as pronounced in the word Father). Mr. Randegger expressly directs that these Lessons should be practised, in conjunction with the Vocal Exercises contained in his "Singing Primer," after the system of respiration and voice-production therein explained have been sufficiently mastered. Apart from the great advantage of practising these Lessons as studies for voice-training, their attraction is musically so great that all lovers of pure melody will be delighted with them as "songs without words"; and in the form now published, therefore, they cannot fail to command an extensive sale.

Studies of Great Composers. By C. Hubert H. Parry, Mus. Doc. [George Routledge and Sons.]

DR. PARRY is so accomplished a musician that we should have been glad to welcome from his pen a series of analytical "studies" of the great creative artists of the world; and, from the title of the work before us, this is precisely what we anticipated. After carefully reading his book, however, we fail to see that it is more than a collection of biographies of composers, the incidental opinions upon their works being what would be naturally called forth by any intellectual recorder of their career. Viewed in this light, we are bound to accord very high praise to the volume, not only for the evident care which has been bestowed upon the collecting of facts, but for the exceedingly clear and concise style of the author. Commencing with Palestrina (in the chapter devoted to whom we have a brief account of the state of music which incited him to the composition of his "Missa Papæ Marcelli"), we pass on to Handel; and here the author appropriately reminds us how long after the death of Palestrina the world had to wait for another composer of the highest rank. "In reality," he says, "the time that passed before works of anything like as great calibre as his were produced again was considerably over a whole century, but to count from the year of his death to the year when Handel and Bach were born is actually ninety-one years. This certainly seems a very long while, and it seems the more remarkable if it is compared with the ninety-one years immediately before the present day. In that time some of Haydn's best symphonies have been written, and his 'Creation,' and his 'Seasons,' all Beethoven's symphonies and masses, and his Opera 'Fidelio,' and Weber's 'Freischütz,' and Schubert's songs, Mendelssohn's oratorios, and Chopin's pianoforte music, and Schumann's many beautiful productions, and all Wagner's immense music-dramas; and if the time is expanded just to a century, it will take in all the greatest of Mozart's symphonies, and his 'Requiem' as well; so it seems to hold almost all that is most interesting in thoroughly modern music." Proving thus how young music really is, we may fairly be astonished at the rapidity of its development; and all who wish to become acquainted with the lives of those who have gradually achieved this result cannot do better than consult Dr. Parry's volume, which, containing biographies of Palestrina, Handel, J. S. Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Wagner, really includes all the representative men of the art up to our own time. The whole of the sketches of these great artists are highly finished, and true to the life. That of Schubert is especially interesting and should be read by all admirers of his music. "His rapidity of thought and of writing," Dr. Parry says, "must have been marvellous. As fast as he finished one thing he generally began another, and often wrote several songs in a single day, and those not songs of the cheap, ephemeral description familiar in modern times, but works of art, with real thought and point and good workmanship in them." We can scarcely believe, with our author, that, although this composer's "symphonies and the masses, and the operas, and the sonatas, and pianoforte pieces, have a place in history, they all must yield in importance to his songs; and it is as the first great representative song-writer that he must be chiefly remembered"; for certainly the one "Symphony and a half," which he mentions, have a "place in history," and also in the hearts of all music-lovers, even of those who thoroughly appreciate the beauty of his songs. Dr. Parry has much to say upon Schumann and Wagner, and his observations upon both these composers show an intimate knowledge of their works. As we have already indicated, however, it is mainly with the lives of the artists selected that our author concerns himself; and it is not until his concluding remarks that he quits facts and gives us individual opinions. In this chapter he tells us truly enough that the German "thoroughness, clearness of judgment, and true nobility of thought in music is still maintained by Johannes Brahms, a descendant in the direct line of Bach and Beethoven." With his estimate of this composer we are inclined in every particular to agree; but it is rather a left-handed compliment to an artist, at one time perfectly idolised, to say that "the list of composers, who came near to the greatest, would not be complete without mention of Spohr."

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE centennial birthday of Carl Maria von Weber was celebrated, on the 18th ult., by festive performances of some of his more important works all over Germany. At the Royal Theatre of Berlin the performances of Wolf's melodrama of "Preciosa," with Weber's incidental music, and of the immortal "Der Freischütz" commemorated the event. The last named work, originally brought out at Berlin in 1821, has been performed over 500 times at the Royal institution in question. We must defer a detailed report on the German Weber commemoration until our next number. With regard to a statement recently published with some ostentation in the Reichsbote, and reproduced in other German papers, to the effect that the church register of Eutin records the day of the baptism of the composer as having been November 20, 1786, a writer in the Pall Mall Gazette truly points out that the explanation will be found by referring to Max Maria von Weber's biography of his father, which says that, as among Catholics the baptism follows on the first or second day after the birth, the birth of Weber must, according to the Eutin register, be referred to the 18th or 19th November, a hundred years ago. The father of the great master has, however, left an autograph manuscript in which he gives a quarter-past eleven, on December 18, as the time of Weber's birth, so that the entry in the church register would appear to be erroneous. Confirmation of this view is contained in the fact that up to Weber's marriage—indeed, up to 1820—his birthday was also celebrated on December 18. In 1820, Weber visited Eutin, and he appears to have adopted November 19 as his birthday from that time, principally because his wife's birthday also fell on November 19. M. M. von Weber, on the other hand, stands by December 18, 1786, and subsequent biographers do the same.

A "Jubilee Edition" has just been published at Berlin (Robert Oppenheim) of Herr August Reissmann's interesting biography of Carl Maria von Weber.

According to a recently published letter of the Princess Sayn-Wittgenstein, Franz Liszt, in his testamentary directions, dating from the year 1861, has enjoined the executrix of his will in a special manner that his remains should be interred at the convent of the Franciscan Brothers at Buda-Pest, of which body he became a member in 1858.

A new Oratorio, "Der Jüngling zu Nain," by Herr Robert Schwalm, the first of a projected series of similar compositions in the performance of which the congregation are supposed to participate, was successfully produced last month at a church in Königsberg. We have already referred to this interesting project in a previous number.

Goldmark's much talked of new opera, "Merlin," was brought out by the Vienna Hof-Theater on November 19, and was very well received. According to a criticism contained in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, it is "the work of a most able musician, who commands in an eminent degree all the technical details appertaining to his art." The principal interpreters were Frau Materna and Herr Winkelmann.

It is stated in German papers that Herr Richard Pohl, the eminent German musical critic of progressive tendencies, is about to publish a novel dealing with the present state of matters musical in the Fatherland.

A most successful first production of Wagner's "Siegfried" took place last month at the Darmstadt Hof-Theater. "Rheingold" and "Die Walküre" had been previously mounted at that establishment, and the consecutive performance of the entire "Ring des Nibelungen" is looked forward to here at no distant date.

Most favourable accounts continue to reach us of the series of Concerts of chamber music lately instituted by Herr Franz Rummel at Berlin. The National Zeitung, of the 4th ult., inter alia, pays a high tribute of praise to that gifted pianist in regard to his rendering, at one of the above Soirées, of the pianoforte part of a new Quartet in C minor, by Herr Richard Straus, and more particularly of Schumann's Fantasia with the motto "Durch alle Töne tönet ein leiser Ton," which elicited the most enthusiastic applause from the audience.

Peter Cornelius's charming comic opera "Der Barbier von Bagdad" was recently produced, for the first time, at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, and met with so unmistakably favourable a reception as to ensure the continuance of the work upon the répertoire of that establishment for some time to come.

Dr. Hans von Bülow will give a series of four "Beethoven Evenings" in the Austrian capital during the present month.

At the second Concert of the Vienna Philharmonic Society, held some few weeks since, under the direction of Dr. Hans Richter, the programme included an admirable performance of Dr. Mackenzie's Violin Concerto, which was very well received, the solo part being played by Herr Rosé.

Frau Peschka-Leutner, the well-known prima donna, is about to retire from operatic life for the purpose of devoting her time exclusively to teaching.

An opera entitled "Der Sturm," the libretto of which is founded upon Shakespeare's "The Tempest," is in course of being mounted at the Royal Opera of Hanover. The composer is Herr Ernst Frank.

Bizet's "Les Pêcheurs de perles" has recently been produced at the theatres of Düsseldorf and of Hanover.

A juvenile pianist and composer, Joseph Hofmann, is just now attracting considerable attention in Berlin musical circles by the extraordinary precocity of his talent, he being only nine years of age. It is said that Eugene d'Albert has undertaken his further instruction.

M. Salvayre's new opera "Egmont," already alluded to in these columns, was successfully brought out last month at the Paris Opéra Comique. This being, so far as we are aware, the first instance of Goethe's stirring tragedy having been utilised for the purposes of the lyrical stage, an additional interest attaches to M. Albert Wolff's, the librettist, version thereof, which is summed up by the able and versatile Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph in the following words:—"M. Albert Wolff has reduced the five acts of Goethe's 'Trauerspiel' into four. The first takes place in the neighbourhood of Brussels, and sets forth the hatred of the burghers for their foreign tyrants. After a little divertissement, with choral accompaniment, a dispute arises, and Brackenburg, Clara's father, is carried off prisoner by the Spanish soldiery. The girl implores Ferdinand, the Duke of Alva's son, to liberate her father, and he accedes to her prayer; but when he requires payment for his condescension Clara calls for help, and Egmont comes to the rescue. He challenges Ferdinand, but they have scarcely crossed swords when the Spanish soldiers reappear. Ferdinand is, however, magnanimous, and will not permit his rival to be seized. There is a chivalrous colour imprinted on all the music allotted to Ferdinand, which contrasts well with the sombre lamentations of the Flemings, and with the graceful strains in which Clara indulges. The chorus of burghers assemble as the daylight fades away. "La Flandre est finie" is built on a well-marked theme, and the phrase "La Patrie est perdue" is followed, with dramatic effect, by the words "Elle est sauvée," spoken by Egmont, as he suddenly appears in the midst of the citizens and offers to be their chief. The act closes with the oath sworn by Egmont, his emphatic phrase being taken up in succession by the choral voices. The second takes place in Brackenburg's house, and is preceded by a "Ronde de Nuit," full of local colour, the trio of this Spanish march being especially original. A duet for Clara and her father (soprano and bass) is followed by a prayer sung by the girl apprehensive for her lover's safety, and the orchestral accompaniment of the scene is brightened by a carillon which is heard striking the hour from the neighbouring churches. The entrance of Egmont, of course, gives occasion for a love duet for soprano and tenor, which merges into a trio when the father returns to find that Clara's lover is his appointed master and chief, the leader of the coming revolt. In the third act we are in the palace inhabited by Margaret of Parma, Regent of the Netherlands, who in her only solo, for she only appears in this one scene, gives vent to her sympathy with the people over whom it has been her duty to rule. Maidens, among whom is Clara, bring her offerings of flowers, and the fête continues to the accompaniment of a tuneful gavotte, until all merrymaking is hushed by the appearance of the deathly face of the Duke of Alva. Egmont, who was followed by a Spaniard after his duel with Ferdinand, is accused of conspiring, and his arrest gives rise to a powerful concerted piece on which the curtain falls. The scene of the fourth and last act is naturally the prison, where Egmont hears read to him his sentence of death. Clärchen brings him the comforting assurance that his friends are about to effect his release, and the lovers give vent to their transports in a duet which will unquestionably prove the most effective morceau of the opera. It is as full of melody as of impulsive passion, and was sung magnificently by Mdlle. Isaac and M. Talazac, whose high chest notes rang clarion-tongued through the house. It produced a tremendous effect. But while the lovers are the world forgetting, they are not by the world forgot. For in the midst of their transports the solemn notes of the mass for the dead strike upon their ear, and as the curtain falls Egmont goes to his doom." Students of Goethe will at once recognise the material, though in view of the exigencies of the lyrical stage perfectly justifiable, deviations from the original drama perpetrated in M. Wolff's libretto. It is remarkable that a drama so suggestive of musical situations as the great German poet's "Egmont," which had already inspired Beethoven to the composition of his famous incidental music, should have been disregarded so long by operatic librettists. More remarkable still that the first operatic librettist who so utilised it should have been a Frenchman.

Curiously enough, the libretto of the only other important French operatic novelty we have to record this month is based on a very similar subject, forming the groundwork of M. Sardou's well-known drama "Patrie," and bearing the same title. The composer is M. Paladilhe, the successful writer of "La Mandolinata," and the première of the work took place with considerable éclat, on the 20th ult., at the Grand Opéra. M. Sardou himself is the author of the libretto, which is said to be highly effective, while the Paris press organs teem with eulogistic accounts concerning the music wedded thereto.

The famous Concerts of the Paris Conservatoire, now in the sixtieth year of their existence, were resumed on the 5th ult.

A very successful performance is reported, on the 6th ult., at the Leipzig Gewandhaus, of Mr. F. H. Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony, and the press organs have taken very favourable notice of it.

The first performance in America of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" took place on the 1st ult., at the Metropolitan Theatre of New York, with the famous Wagner tenor, Herr Albert Niemann, and Mesdames Lilli Lehmann and Marianne Brandt as the interpreters of the principal characters.

A bill has just been presented to the Italian Chamber of Deputies, to empower the Government to remove the remains of Rossini from their present resting place, at the Père la Chaise, of Paris, to the historical Church of Santa Croce, in Florence, in conjunction with the testamentary executors of the composer's widow. The removal is to take place in May next, on which occasion there will be a solemn religious service, with the Maëstro's music, and the remains will probably be placed near the monument of Cherubini.

Under the title of "Poliuto," M. Gounod's opera "Polyeucte" is to be produced during the present winter at the San Carlo Theatre of Naples, under the personal direction of the composer.

The principal works to be performed during next season at La Scala Theatre of Milan, are Verdi's new opera "Otello" and the same composer's "Aïda," Bizet's "I Pescatori di Perle," and Samara's successful opera "Flora Mirabilis." The leading artists engaged for the season are Mesdames Emma Calvé, Giulia Novelli, Pantaleoni, and Petrovich; MM. Maurel, Garulli, Coletti, Navarrini, Roveri, Tamagno, Fornari, Limonta, and Paroli.

Both at Milan and Turin a new opera "Edmea," by the Maëstro Catalani, has recently been produced with very considerable success.

It is stated in German journals that Herr Felix Draeseke's "Requiem," the recent performance of which by the Riedel'sche Gesangverein, of Leipzig, has attracted a more general attention to the work, is to be produced during this year at Rome, by special desire of the King of Italy.

A statue of the popular Russian composer, Glinka, was unveiled on November 27 at Smolensk, in the vicinity of which town the composer was born. The day of unveiling likewise coincided with the fiftieth anniversary of the first performance of Glinka's celebrated national opera, "The Life for the Czar."

The death is announced, at Darmstadt, on November 17, of Louis Schlœsser, for many years a distinguished member of the orchestra of the Darmstadt Hof-Theater, in the capacity of first violinist and musical director, the composer of numerous operas, and other musical compositions, both for the church and the chamber, and, of late years, also a distinguished contributor to the German musical press. The deceased artist was born at Darmstadt in the year 1800, and was a pupil of several celebrated masters, amongst them Rink, at his native town; Salieri, at Vienna; Lesueur and Kreutzer in Paris.

At Berlin died, on November 20, the highly gifted young pianist, Anna Prill, aged twenty-three.

The death is also announced at Barcelona of Elena d'Angri, the once celebrated operatic contralto, whose fame extended far beyond the limits of her native Italy, and who retired from the stage as long ago as 1847, while she was yet in the zenith of her popularity, her principal rôles being "Sappho," "Semiramide," and "Lucrezia Borgia."

CORRESPONDENCE.

EMPLOYMENT OF FEMALE VOICES IN CHURCH CHOIRS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I notice in your issue for December a letter signed "Cantatrice," on the subject of female voices in Church choirs. Like everything else that is new, whether it be an improvement on the old order or not, the introduction of boys' voices into choirs, and their gradual substitution for female voices, has been the subject of much discussion and much that is indefensible. It has, however, borne the attack and come off victorious, and now we see everywhere the disappearance, I hope for ever, of "mixed" choirs. No sooner are we at peace than a new suggestion is put forward. The rejected ones are not content to be put out for ever, but since the verdict has been given against them, they plead for a back seat, giving, as their reason, that their voices are "purer" and sweeter than those of the boys. With this remark—and I think in doing so I shall have the support of many able judges—I beg to differ. A properly trained boy's voice is far away sweeter than the ordinary run of female choir voices, and certainly bears comparison with the very best of them. Boys, we must remember, were introduced into choirs, not only because they were boys, but because their voices were also allowed to be most suitable for the purpose, and as to the comparison between treble and soprano, we have the testimony of men which I suppose "Cantatrice" will consider unimpeachable—e.g., Rev. J. Troutbeck. Of course, we cannot expect that the rejected singers will accept their rejection without considerable demur, but we do hope that such suggestions as are contained in "Cantatrice's" letter may never be acted upon.—I am, yours very truly,

December 2, 1886. CANTAB.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Many surely will echo "Cantatrice's" opinion as to the value of women's voices as a supplement to surpliced choirs. Everyone of experience must acknowledge the frequent want of tone and quality in boys' voices, unless under training for years—a want not atoned for by numbers. In answer to the question asked, there are several churches, both in London and the country, to my knowledge, where ladies have the back rows in the chancel assigned to them. I may mention Canon Shuttleworth's Church, St. George's, Bloomsbury; and at the church of which I have been twenty-two years organist, Holy Trinity, Little Queen Street, Holborn, a surpliced choir will be introduced at Christmas, and arrangements have been made, by special request, to retain the ladies at the back.

I remain, dear Sir, yours truly,

M. J. COPE.

CATHEDRAL MUSIC IN DENVER.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In one of my articles on "Music in America," which you were good enough to publish last year, I referred to the excellent choral service in St. John's Cathedral, Denver, Col. Since then I have received, from time to time, reports of musical doings in connection with the principal church of that wonderful city, and as both the Precentor, Mr. Stevenson, and the Organist, Mr. Walter E. Hall, F.C.O., are Englishmen, I venture to hope that your readers will not turn away unconcernedly from a few details.

Last month Mr. Stevenson kindly forwarded to me the order of service for Thanksgiving Day, when the Anthem was Hiller's "Song of Victory" in its entirety; the "service," chants, responses, &c., being selected from Tallis, Macfarren, Turle, Oakeley, and Tours, the Benedicite being the work of the Precentor himself. Mr. Stevenson writes: "We give on every great Festival some of the greater works—for instance, at Easter, Mendelssohn's 'Come let us sing' (with final chorus); last Thanksgiving, Mendelssohn's 'Athalie'; during Lent, Haydn's 'Passion,' Mendelssohn's 'Christus,' and Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle.' . . . Last Sunday were sung Beethoven's 'Hallelujah' and Trimnell's 'The Lord is King'; and to-morrow (Advent Sunday) we take Barnby's 'It is high time,' and Handel's 'And the glory.' Our choir numbers about sixty voices, and it is entirely voluntary."

Mr. Hall has also been good enough to write, enclosing a programme of six weekly subscription "Orchestral and Organ Recitals" held in the Cathedral. The plan of these Recitals includes the use of a solo orchestral instrument, in addition to the organ, and I find in each programme nothing but music of the highest class. Ex uno disce omnes! Here is the first:—Prelude and Fugue in A (Bach); Andante favori for violin and organ, in F (Beethoven); Organ Concerto in G (Handel); Larghetto from Second Symphony (Beethoven); Air in C, for violin and organ (Bach); March from "Lohengrin" (Wagner). Mr. Hall observes in his letter: "No doubt you will scan the enclosed with interest, as showing what I am doing at the front. The Recitals proved a musical, though not a financial, success. Still, I am perfectly satisfied with the result, as the change from 'the Indian and the buffalo' to organ recitals in twenty years is not a poor change after all."

I have much pleasure in thus drawing attention, by your favour, to the excellent doings of our countrymen in the shadow of the "Rockies," and in reminding your readers that these efforts are not mere "bounce" with insufficient means. The Denver Cathedral Choir, as I heard it two years ago, would easily hold its own with the Cathedral Choirs of England.—Faithfully yours,

JOSEPH BENNETT.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABINGDON.—The Messiah was given on Thursday, the 16th ult., by the Musical Association, in the New Corn Exchange, a building admirably adapted for such performances. The soloists were Miss Maude Viccars, Miss Rant, and Messrs. Robinson and Sunman of the Cathedral Choir, Oxford. Miss Viccars is a young artist possessing a clear and telling voice of great promise. The other soloists sustained their several parts with credit to themselves and pleasure to their audience. The choruses bore marks of steady improvement on the part of the choir, which has largely increased in numbers this season; while it is a matter for congratulation that the band, almost entirely composed of members of the Society, under the leadership of Mr. T. Miles, was thoroughly satisfactory. Mr. Fred. K. Couldrey conducted, as usual.——A Children's Concert, in connection with the Junior Guild of St. George, was given in the Council Chamber, on Monday, the 20th ult. The programme consisted of the "Children's National Hymn," by Mrs. Gabriel Davis (composed expressly for the Guild), Smart's Cantata, King René's Daughter, and Desmond Ryan's new Toy Symphony. The solos of the Cantata were sung by Mrs. Kendall, Mrs. Clench, and the Misses M. Tomkins, Rant, and Drewe, the choruses being rendered by the children. Misses Eagle and Hughes performed the Overture as a Pianoforte duet, and Mrs. Slade Baker accompanied her pupils in the vocal parts and also in the Toy Symphony. There is a great improvement in the part singing of the Guild, which was marked throughout the evening by its precision and sweetness. The Toy Symphony was rendered by an orchestra of twenty-nine performers, and by its novelty and brightness formed a very popular part of the programme.

BASINGSTOKE.—The Harmonic and Amateur Orchestral Societies gave a Concert in the New Masonic Hall on the 7th ult. The soloists were Miss A. Knowles, Mr. T. Hunt, and Mr. E. Forrest. The works performed were Anderton's Wreck of the Hesperus and Romberg's Transient and Eternal. Five pieces were played by the orchestra, and Miss A. Hunt contributed two violin solos. Mr. Webster accompanied on the pianoforte, and Miss E. Hunt on the harmonium. The Concert was under the conductorship of Mr. W. H Liddle, Organist of St. Michael's Church.

BELFAST.—A Concert in aid of local charities was given in the Ulster Hall, on the 6th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Thomas H. Crowe. The vocalists were Mrs. Shaw, Mrs. H. Ritchie, Miss Wallace, Miss Hamilton, Messrs. Boyd and King, and Captain Anstey. One of the most important features of the Concert was the organ performance of Mr. Crowe, who fully confirmed the highly favourable opinions elicited by his recent Recitals upon the organ erected in Bangor Church.

BISHOP AUCKLAND.—The members of the Musical Society inaugurated their Eleventh Season on the 10th ult., by a Concert in the Town Hall, the chief attraction of which was the first representation of a new Oratorio, St. Thomas, by N. Kilburn, Mus. Bac., Cantab. The work was well rendered, the solos being effectively sung by Miss Thudichum and Mr. Champion. Mr. Kilburn conducted. The miscellaneous portion of the programme included violin solos by Madame Brousil, and cornet solos by Mr. Monkhouse. The accompanists were Mrs. Rayner, Messrs. Hornung, W. Brotherton, J. K. Brotherton, and W. Bowron.

BLACKBURN.—A successful Organ Recital was given in St. Philip's Church, on Tuesday evening, November 30, by Mr. T. Blackshaw, Organist of St. John's Church. The programme was varied and well selected. Vocal pieces were admirably sung by St. John's choir. The organ is a magnificent instrument by Willis, and contains three manuals and over forty stops.——The St. Cecilia Society, which has now entered upon its twelfth season, gave its first Concert on Monday, the 13th ult. The first part consisted of Charles H. Lloyd's Andromeda, the principal parts in which were sustained by Miss Fanny Bristowe, Miss Richardson, Mr. Thornborough, and Mr. Higginson. Mr. J. H. Rooks, Conductor of musical societies at Bradford, Mirfield, and Shipley, conducted the Concert with his usual ability. The second part of the programme opened with Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, in which Mr. J. D. Bird gave a most excellent interpretation of the pianoforte part.

BOURNEMOUTH.—The fourth of the series of entertainments organised by Mr. S. Wall Richards took place at the Shaftesbury Hall, on Saturday, the 18th ult., when Mr. J. T. Carrodus, assisted by Miss Bertha Moore and Miss Ada Bright (accompanist), gave a Violin Recital and Concert. There was a large attendance, and the character of the entertainment amply justified the measure of public support which was accorded it. An interesting programme was presented, including Fantasia from "Othello" (Ernst); Violin and Piano Concertante, Two Melodies, Op. 47 (Molique); "Chaconne" (Bach), for violin alone; solo violin (on one string), "Mosé in Egitto" (Paganini); "Reverie" (Vieuxtemps); "Le Tremolo" (De Beriot); and "The Carnival of Venice" (Ernst). Miss Ada Bright was excellent as accompanist, and Miss Bertha Moore's songs were exceedingly successful. She possesses a fine, clear, and well-trained soprano voice, and sings with an amount of expression which always enlists the sympathy of the audience.

BRISTOL.—November 30, being St. Andrew's Day, special services were held at St. Andrew's Church, Montpelier. At the Evensong the choral part of the service was undertaken by an augmented choir of seventy voices, consisting of the choirs of St. Andrew's and St. Barnabas's Churches, assisted by the ladies of Mr. Brookes's private choir. In place of the organ accompaniment, the instrumental portion was performed by a band of twenty-two performers, led by Mr. F. Watts, and Mr. Alfred Brookes (Organist of St. Andrew's Church) officiated as Conductor. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Stainer in A; the Anthem was a selection from The Messiah, Mr. Wilmut singing "Comfort ye" and "Every valley," and Miss A. Wensley "How beautiful are the feet." The Rev. P. H. Leary, of All Saints', Clifton, was the preacher. There was a very large congregation, the offertory being on behalf of the Additional Curates' Aid Society.——On Friday evening, the 17th ult., a very successful Concert was given by Mr. J. F. Nash, in the large Victoria Room. Songs, and violin and pianoforte solos, were given respectively by Miss Marie Gane, Mr. Theo. Carrington, and Mr. J. F. Nash. Several quartets and songs were rendered by the Bristol Cathedral Quartet, Messrs. W. Jones, E. T. Morgan, J. F. Nash, and W. Thomas.

BROCKLEY.—The first Concert of the present season of the St. Peter's Choral Society was given on Tuesday, the 7th ult., at St. Peter's Hall, under the conductorship of Dr. C. J. Frost, and consisted of a performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul, with Miss Ambler, Miss Alice Heale, Mr. Dalzell, and Mr. W. H. Brereton, as soloists. Mr. William Hodge presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Barker, A.C.O., at the harmonium. The performance of the Oratorio was in every way worthy of this flourishing Society, and Dr. Frost may congratulate himself on his admirable chorus and the result of his careful training.——A selection from Handel's Messiah was given in St. Peter's Church on Friday evening, the 17th ult., the choruses being sung by the choir of the church (augmented in number to 100 voices), and the solos by Madame Ernst, Miss Annie Morley, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. H. C. Thomas. Mr. W. Hodge presided at the organ, and Dr. C. J. Frost conducted. The service reflected great credit upon all concerned, the choruses being admirably rendered, and the principal singers doing ample justice to the solos.

BURNLEY.—The parish of Holy Trinity celebrated its Jubilee during November and December by numerous services, a Réunion, and a Concert, the latter under the able direction of Mr R. Watson, Organist and Choirmaster.——The Burnley Vocal Union gave its first Concert this season in the Victoria Assembly Rooms, on the 13th ult., when Spohr's Last Judgment was rendered, with Miss Bertha Moore, Miss Horner, Mr. Kendal Thompson, and Mr. Santley as principals, the orchestra, of strings only, being supplemented by pianoforte (Mr. Fred. Myers) and harmonium (Mr. A. E. Bridge). Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank, Mus. Bac., Oxon., conducted. The choir showed a considerable advance in confidence and precision of attack on any of the previous Concerts. In the second part of the programme, which was miscellaneous, Mr. Santley was enthusiastically applauded, and, in response to an encore, gave "Here's a health unto his Majesty." Boccherini's favourite Minuet, and a Bourrée (Cruickshank) were efficiently performed by the band, and part-songs by Walker and Stevens were well rendered by the Union.——On the 13th ult., a Choir Festival was celebrated in St. Leonard's Church, Padiham, by the united choirs of the parish. The Anthem was "The King of Love" (Gounod). A very large congregation assembled. Mr. Baker presided at the organ.——On the 20th ult., Mr. Massey's choir gave a performance of Elijah, before a crowded audience, in the recently-enlarged Assembly Room (Mechanics' Institute). The principal vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Wakefield, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. Brereton, who were highly appreciated. Local talent was well represented by Miss Horner, Mrs. Horner, Mr. Burrell, and Mr. Arnold. Mr. J. E. Gaul was the Organist, and Mr. Massey conducted. The orchestra was almost entirely selected from Mr. Hallé's band.

BURTON-ON-TRENT.—A Service of Sacred Music, on the lines of those introduced in Gloucester Cathedral, was given at St. Paul's Church, on the 17th ult., before a large congregation. The selection, both vocal and instrumental, was in the highest degree interesting.——At St. Paul's Institute a Recital of organ music by M. Alex. Guilmant drew an enormous audience, and his performance was listened to throughout with the utmost attention.——The Orpheus Quartet gave a Grand Concert in St. George's Hall, on Monday, the 20th ult., under the patronage of the Right Hon. Lord Burton and other distinguished persons. The principal vocalists were Miss Fraser Brunner, Miss Emilie Harris, and Mr. Bingley Shaw. The instrumentalists were Mr. W. Slack and Mr. G. Clements. The Glee Party, consisting of Messrs. E. W. Richardson, H. Greenwood, J. J. Tomlinson, and W. B. Dunbar sang a number of glees.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—The first Concert of the season was given by the Choral Society, on Tuesday evening, the 21st ult., the work chosen being Handel's Samson, which proved a great success. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Griffin, Miss Meredyth Elliott, Mr. James Gawthrop, and Mr. Egbert Roberts. The band and chorus, numbering about 130, was thoroughly efficient, and Mr. T. B. Richardson proved an efficient Conductor.

CALNE, WILTS.—An evening Concert was given by the members of the Musical Society, on Tuesday, the 7th ult., at the Town Hall. The first and most important part of the programme consisted of Farmer's Oratorio Christ and His Soldiers. The band and chorus, numbering about sixty, were ably conducted by Mr. W. R. Pullein, the Organist of the Parish Church, whose labours in training the members must have been very great. The solos were efficiently taken by Mrs. Angell, Mrs. G. I. Gough, Miss Bessie Heath, Mr. Godfrey, and Mr. Frayling. The second part was miscellaneous.

CATERHAM VALLEY.—A very successful Concert, under the management of the Rev. J. F. Roe, was given in the Harestone Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 15th ult., in aid of the funds of the Cottage Hospital. The artists were Miss Esmée Woodford, Miss Reynolds, Mr. John Probert, Mr. W. Knight, the Rev. J. F. Roe, and Dr. Simpson. Accompanist, Mr. H. Withall. Herr Max, and Masters Ernest and Leo Schrattenholz played a Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and solos on the violin and violoncello were contributed by the two last named artists with great effect.

CHICHESTER.—The first Concert of the Funtington and West Ashling Glee Choir was given on the 3rd ult. The choir was highly efficient, and reflected much credit upon the excellent training of their Conductor, Mr. Seymour Kelly, of Chichester Cathedral. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Seymour Kelly, Miss M. Gatehouse, and Mr. C. E. Pillow; Miss P. Gatehouse was the solo pianist, and Miss M. Osmond accompanist.

CLEVEDON.—The members of the Choral Society gave their usual Winter Concert on the 14th ult. The programme included Mendelssohn's 42*nd Psalm*, Gounod's Motett, "By Babylon's Wave," and excerpts from Handel's Oratorios. Madame Wilson-Osman was the principal vocalist, and solos were also given by members of the Society. Mr. W. Haydn Cox, L.R.A.M., conducted.

COATBRIDGE, N.B.—The Choral Union of this town has recently been resuscitated, and has enrolled a choir of 300 voices and a small but efficient orchestra. The first rehearsal of the choruses in The Messiah took place on Monday, the 13th ult. Mr. Thomas Dixon is the Conductor, and Mr. William Harvey the accompanist.

COLCHESTER.—The Musical Society, under the able direction of Mr. James Dace, gave an excellent performance of Handel's Samson, on the 6th ult., in the Corn Exchange. The choruses were capitally rendered, and the soloists—Miss Fanny Perfitt, R.A.M., Miss Susetta Fenn, R.A.M., Mr. Sinclair Dunn, R.A.M., and Mr. John Ridding, R.C.M., were highly effective. Mr. W. C. Everitt accompanied on the harmonium.

COVENTRY.—The Musical Society commenced their tenth season on Tuesday, the 7th ult., with one of the most successful Concerts yet given. The first part of the programme included Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas Overture, admirably played by the orchestra, and Mr. C. H. Lloyd's Hero and Leander, which was so well rendered, that Mr. Lloyd, who conducted his own work, must have been highly gratified. Its reception was hearty, even to enthusiasm. The second part was miscellaneous. The solo vocalists were Miss Hyde and Mr. Grice. Miss Winifred Robinson gave an admirable rendering of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. The Concert was brought to a close by the March and Chorus from Tannhäuser (Wagner). The season has opened well, and Mr. Brewer is to be congratulated on his first appearance here as Conductor.——On Wednesday evening, the 15th ult., Mr. G. J. Robertson, F.C.O., gave his second Organ Recital at St. John's Church, assisted by the members of the choir. The programme, which was well selected, was excellently rendered and highly appreciated.

COWES.—On Thursday evening, the 16th ult., the members of the Northwood Musical Society gave an excellent rendering of Handel's Messiah. The soloists were Miss Kate Norman, Mrs. Thorpe, Mr. Charles E. Pillow, and Mr. Seymour Kelly. There was a full band and chorus, numbering in all about 100. The choruses were well rendered, reflecting much credit on the training of Mr. F. Rutland, the Conductor. A word of praise is also due to the instrumentalists. Miss Gibson presided at the piano, and Mr. W. Scadding at the organ.

DARLINGTON.—A successful Chamber Concert was given in the Central Hall, on the 10th ult., by Messrs. Dittmar. The artists were Miss Louie Harper, R.A.M., vocalist; Herr Jean Dittmar, pianoforte; Herr Heinrich Dittmar, violin; Mr. Frank Weston, cello; and Mr. T. Henderson accompanied. The programme included a Sonata in F, for violin and pianoforte (Mozart), the Adagio and Finale of Vieuxtemps's Concerto in E, F. David's "Am Springquell" for violin, "Caprice Hongrois," by Dunkler, for cello solo, and Henselt's Concert Etude in A flat, for pianoforte. The programme concluded with a fine performance of Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor. The programme was repeated at Northallerton on the 13th ult.

DARTFORD.—On Monday, November 29, a Ballad Concert was given at the Assembly Rooms, before a large audience. The principal vocalists were Madame Wilson-Osman, Miss Marian Ellis, the Misses Webling, Mr. T. Page, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, all of whom were very successful. Special mention must be made of Mr. Tufnail's contributions to the programme, and also of Mr. Albert Fox's pianoforte solo.

DERBY.—The first Subscription Concert of the Orchestral Union was given in the Drill Hall, on the 8th ult. The programme included Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Schubert's Rosamunde Overture, Mendelssohn's "Calm sea and prosperous voyage," and Sullivan's Entr'acte to Henry VIII. The orchestra, reinforced by a contingent from Manchester, was led by Mr. E. King, and conducted by Mr. Neville Cox. Miss Mary Moon, R.A.M., a Sheffield vocalist of considerable promise and ability, made her first appearance and achieved a great success. Mr. Cox played Raff's "Rigaudon" with considerable skill, and Mr. J. D. Foxon accompanied admirably.

EASTBOURNE.—The opening Concert of the Musical Society's season was held on the 2nd ult., at the Town Hall, when Sir A. Sullivan's sacred Musical Drama, The Martyr of Antioch, was given before a crowded audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Kate Norman, Miss Lena Little, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Frank May, all of whom were eminently successful. The band (which was led by Mr. E. J. Sangster) was highly efficient, and the choral numbers were, on the whole, well rendered by the large choir, though the Funeral Anthem suffered from a want of delicacy and precision. Mr. S. G. R. Coles, F.C.O., and Mr. G. Legge, gave valuable assistance at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively. The Concert (which concluded with a short selection from The Messiah) was conducted by Dr. W. H. Sangster.

EMSWORTH.—The eleventh Concert of the Choral Society was given on the 14th ult., when The Messiah was most creditably performed. The soloists were Miss Kate Norman, Miss Annie Dwelley, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. Seymour Kelly (Chichester Cathedral), who gave a spirited rendering of "Why do the Nations." Mr. W. Packham presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. W. D. Pillow at the harmonium. Mr. C. R. Pillow conducted, and is to be congratulated on the high state of efficiency of his choir.

ENNISKILLEN.—Mr. Arnold read a very interesting paper on "Music" in the Town Hall, on November 25, before a crowded audience.——The Musical Club gave two very successful performances in the Town Hall, on the 15th and 16th ult., of Sullivan's Comic Operas, The Sorcerer and Trial by Jury, under the able direction of Mr. Matthew Arnold.

FROME.—On Thursday evening, the 16th ult., the Wesley Chapel was crowded in every part to hear a performance of Handel's Samson. The principal soloists were Miss Marie Gane, Miss Cogswell, Mr. E. T. Morgan, Mr. Trotman, Mr. Tucker, and Mr. J. Lewis. An efficient band and chorus, under the conductorship of Mr. C. J. Grant, added to the interest of the performance. Mr. F. Derry presided at the organ.

GOSPORT.—At the Concert given at the Thorngate Memorial Hall, on November 28, the vocalists were Miss Katherine James and Mr. Robert Salinger. The former contributed four songs, all of which were rendered in a manner which elicited loud applause, the performance of Mr. Salinger being equally successful. Corporal Siedenstucker played two cornet solos, and several selections were exceedingly well executed by the band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry, under the direction of Mr. George Miller. During the interval between the parts of the programme, Lady Willis presented certificates to the members of the Gosport Branch of the Portsmouth Centre of the St. John Ambulance Society.——The last of the first series of Monday Popular Concerts was given on the 6th ult. The vocalists were Mrs. Seymour Kelly and Mr. Seymour Kelly (Chichester Cathedral), both of whom were highly successful. The band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry formed the orchestra, under the direction of Mr. George Miller, and Mr. Harvey Pinches acted as accompanist.

GUILDFORD.—On the 9th ult., a Concert, with Recitals, was given in the Borough Hall. The programme included vocal and instrumental music of a varied character. Miss José Sherrington sang the "Jewel song" from Faust, and two ballads, besides taking part in several quartets and duets. Miss Annie Layton, Mr. Alfred Rudland, and Mr. Alfred J. Layton were the other vocalists, and each sang a song, by Mr. Tiltman, a local Professor and Organist, which gave additional interest to the Concert. Mrs. A. J. Layton, F.C.O., was the solo pianist, and Mr. G. H. Wilby (silver medalist, R.A.M.), violinist. Mr. H. T. Tiltman, F.C.O., conducted. Mrs. Ellis Cameron recited with great power "The trial scene" (Merchant of Venice), scene between Sir Peter and Lady Teazle (School for Scandal), and a scene from The Love Chase.

HIGHAM FERRERS.—The Church Choral Union gave The Messiah, before a crowded audience, on the 13th ult. The work was exceedingly well performed. The solo vocalists were Miss Vinnie Beaumont, who was most successful in her solos; Miss Coyte Turner, Mr. R. Groome, and Mr. H. Noble. Mr. W. Felce conducted.

HUDDERSFIELD.—The second of the Subscription Concerts for Moldgreen Church took place on the 6th ult. The vocalists were Miss Marjorie Eaton, Miss Ada Burton, Mr. C. F. Haigh, and Mr. Bartin. The programme was well rendered and several encores accorded. The instrumental selections were given by a band organised by Mr. Walter Shaw. Mr. S. Dawson was the accompanist.

HURSTPIERPOINT.—On Thursday evening, the 16th ult., the members of the Choral Society gave their first Concert of the season in the Music Room, under the direction of Mr. F. J. Karn, Mus. Bac., Cantab., the Conductor of the Society. The work selected was Gade's Erl King's Daughter, which was a great success. The baritone solos were admirably sung by the Rev. J. H. Bebbington, and the other soloists were Miss Annie Tate, R.A.M., and Miss M. A. Chart, both of whom were well received. The quality of tone in the chorus was very good, all the parts being efficient and well balanced. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. Miss White acted as accompanist.

IPSWICH.—Mr. James Price gave a Pianoforte Recital, at the Public Hall, on the 9th ult., the programme of which fully tested his power of rendering high-class music of varied styles. The most successful items in the selection were Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 27, No. 2; a Fugue by Mendelssohn; Schumann's Toccata, Op. 7; Chopin's Nocturne, Op. 32, No. 1; Rubinstein's Valse in A flat; and Liszt's Polonaise in E major, all of which were well executed, from memory, and warmly applauded.

JERSEY.—Two Concerts were given by the Choral Society on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, the 14th and 15th ult., at the Oddfellows' Hall, when the Creation was well performed before crowded audiences. The principal artists were Madame Minnie Gwynne, Mr. C. W. Fredericks, and Mr. F. May. Mr. E. Dowden conducted, Messrs. C. E. R. Stevens and I. Malzard presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. Mallett at the organ. There was also an efficient orchestra.

KETTERING.—On November 29 a performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah was given by the Choral Society. The soloists engaged were Miss Ambler (Mrs. W. H. Brereton), Madame Florence Winn, Mr. Castings, and Mr. W. H. Brereton. Mr. H. G. Gotch conducted, and assistance was rendered in the double Quartet by Miss Gotch, Miss Farey, Mr. C. Lawrence, Mr. James Palmer, and Mrs. T. O. Miller, all members of the Society.

KINGSTON-ON-THAMES.—A successful entertainment was given in the Albany Hall, on Saturday evening, the 4th ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The pianoforte solos of Miss Edge were well received, and Miss E. Reed's singing was all that could be desired. The remainder of the programme was ably sustained by the members of the Unit Quartet Party—Messrs. Nelson, Crawley, Maude, and Hulford. The entertainment was under the direction of Mr. Frederick Rivenhall.

LANDPORT (PORTSMOUTH).—The first of a series of Tuesday Popular Concerts was given on the 7th ult. The band of the Royal Marine Light Infantry, conducted by Mr. George Miller, played several well chosen pieces in excellent style, and vocal solos were contributed with much success by Mrs. and Mr. Seymour Kelly; Mr. H. Harvey Pinches was the accompanist.

LEAMINGTON.—The last of the Musical Society's Concerts for the past year took place at the Public Hall, on the 15th ult., when Haydn's Creation was given before a large audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Lilian Mills, Mr. Ralph Dawes, and Mr. Thomas Horrex. The attack of the choruses was particularly good. Mr. Heden led the band and Mr. Frank Spinney was the Conductor.

LEES.—On Tuesday, the 7th ult., a Concert was given in the Lees and Hey Conservative Club by Mr. Greaves's Concert party, before a crowded audience. All the soloists were very successful, and Mr. J. Greaves accompanied and played several compositions in a masterly manner.

LEICESTER.—The first of Mr. Harvey Löhr's Chamber Concerts for the present (the fifth) season was given at the Museum Lecture Hall, on the 7th ult. There were at least two items in the programme which might be called novelties to a Leicester audience—Spohr's Quartet in E minor, for strings, and Rheinberger's Quintet in C major, for pianoforte and strings. In the former of these, Mdlle. Anna Lang distinguished herself by her excellent violin playing, and afterwards created a marked impression in a solo composed by Mr. Löhr. The other artists in the concerted piece were Mr. Ellis Roberts, Mr. W. Richardson, and Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, Mr. Löhr taking the pianoforte part in Rheinberger's Quintet. The Concert-giver's solo was Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata, in which he displayed high artistic powers, and received warm and well deserved applause. Mr. J. G. Robertson was the vocalist, and gave such an excellent rendering of Gounod's "Salve dimora" as to elicit an enthusiastic encore.

LLANELLY.—The fourth Annual Concert of Mr. Arthur W. Swindell's pupils was given on the 20th ult., in the Athenæum Hall, before a crowded audience. The programme was excellently carried out.

LONGSIGHT.—On the 6th ult., a very successful Concert was given in the Mechanics' Institute, for the benefit of St. John's Sunday School Library. The artists were Miss Macfarlane, Miss Ada Pendlebury, and Mr. Ernest Bardsley, vocalists; Mr. W. Louch, L.R.A.M., solo pianoforte; and Mr. W. Astington, solo violin. Mr. Louch, the Organist of St. John's Church, played several solos with much effect, and also accompanied the vocal music. The members of the St. John's Vocal Society (Conductor, Mr. Horatio J. Talbot) gave a selection of glees, madrigals, and part-songs.

LOUTH.—The last of a series of three Concerts, in aid of the Parish Church Schools, took place on the 16th ult., in the Town Hall, in which 300 school children, assisted by a choir of tenors and basses took part. The programme included Bishop's Overture, Guy Mannering, and the Finale of Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, played by the band, Romberg's "Toy" Symphony, songs, part-songs, rounds, and musical drill by the infants, concluding with the new Vocal Waltz, "Skipping," accompanied by the band, which was very effective. Mr. G. H. Porter, Organist of the Parish Church, was the musical director and accompanist.

MIRFIELD, YORKSHIRE.—On Thursday evening, the 16th ult., the Choral Society gave its first Concert, when The Messiah was performed, with Miss Norton, Madame Armitage, Mr. H. Taylor, and Mr. W. Riley as principals, the band and chorus numbering about 120. The choir sang extremely well (considering that it is a young Society) under the bâton of Mr. W. C. Ainley, Mus. Bac.

NEW SWINDON.—The new organ, which was formally opened at St. Mark's Church, on Wednesday, the 8th ult., has supplied a long felt want, the old one having for some time past been in such a dilapidated condition as to be unfit for service. The new instrument, which has been built to the specification of Mr. F. W. Hayward, the Organist of St. Mark's, by Messrs. Alex. Young and Sons, of Manchester, is a splendid three manual instrument, containing 36 stops and 1,684 pipes, all the pipes to the "tenor C" being of the best spotted metal. At the conclusion of the service a Recital was given by Mr. F. W. Hayward, the programme consisting of selections from the works of Bach, Batiste, Guilmant, Wély, Raff, and Mendelssohn, the widely different character of which gave opportunity for displaying the powerful and brilliant, as well as soft and sweet, tones of the instrument. Mr. Hayward, by his masterly playing of Bach's Fugue on St. Ann's Tune, Guilmant's Scherzo Symphonique, and Wély's Grand Offertoire in A, fully sustained his reputation.

NEWTON ABBOT.—The pupils of Tower House School, Courtenay Park, gave a Concert on the 16th ult. to a large audience at the Alexandra Hall. The performance, which lasted about three hours, included a pianoforte duet "Semiramide," efficiently rendered by Miss F. Huxtable and Mr. J. Brown, and a piano solo, "Home, sweet home" (Thalberg), well played by Miss Huxtable. The vocalists were Mr. A. J. Truscott, Mrs. Truscott, Miss Knill, Rev. A. H. Walker, and Mr. J. Brown. The choruses, including "Little Sailors" and "Fairie Voices," were sung by the pupils with much taste and precision. Mr. J. Brown was the Conductor, and was assisted in the pianoforte accompaniments by Mr. A. G. Lombardini.

NORTH ELMHAM.—On Wednesday, the 8th ult., a very successful Vocal and Instrumental Concert was given at the National School. A good programme was excellently performed to the gratification of an audience, appreciative, though small, on account of inclement weather. The principal items were Mr. Slater's performance of Raff's "La Fileuse" and Scharwenka's "Polish Dance," No. 1 (pianoforte solos), and the singing of Miss Kunsdorff and Mr. Trueman, Curschmann's "Ständchen" being beautifully rendered by the former. The part-songs by the choir were among the best performances of the evening; two, "A Ryghte Merrie Geste" (humorous), and "The Oyster Dredgers" (composed by the Conductor, Mr. W. W. Pearson), being exceedingly well received, the former gaining an enthusiastic encore. A Flute and Piano Duo, "La Muette de Portici," by Auber, was given by Messrs. Shellard and Slater. The vocal duets were well received, and Mr. Slater's comic songs were encored with great enthusiasm.

NORTHWICH.—The Philharmonic Society gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul, on Tuesday, November 30, at the Central Hall, before a large audience. The principal vocalists were Madame Alice Barth, Miss Louise Lyle, Mr. Webster Williams, and Mr. Bingley Shaw; Conductor, the Rev. Arthur Whitley. Madame Barth was very successful in the rendering of her solos, her best effort being "I will sing of Thy great mercies"; and Mr. Bingley Shaw, of Southwell Cathedral, displayed a good voice and cultured style in the principal bass music.

PERTH, N.B.—About 3,000 persons assembled in the City Hall, on the 7th ult., to hear the performance of Judas Maccabæus by the Musical Society. The work was ably rendered, the principal vocalists being Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. J. Moncur, and Mr. J. Fleming, who were well received, Miss Beaumont especially eliciting warm applause for her rendering of the soprano solos. Miss Steele was at the pianoforte, Mr. Wylie at the harmonium, and Mr. Bryson led the orchestra. Mr. F. Graves was an efficient Conductor.

PETERSHAM, NEAR SYDNEY.—A Choral Festival was held at All Saints', Church of England, on Saturday afternoon, October 23, when the new organ lately sent over from England was blessed by the Bishop, and used for the first time. A choir of sixty-six voices (All Saints' choir alone numbers fifty members) rendered the music, and walked in procession up the nave singing "Hark! the organ loudly peals," a large number of the clergy bringing up the rear. Evensong followed to Tallis's Festival setting, the Rev. Arthur R. Rivers being Precentor, and Mr. W. Stanley playing the organ, he in turn resigning his place to Mr. F. Morley during the Anthem and voluntaries, and to Miss Berry, the Organist of the Church, during the hymns. The Cantate Domino and Deus Misereatur were both sung to music by Dr. John Smith, of All Saints', and well rendered, under the direction of Mr. John B. Wareham, honorary Choirmaster of All Saints'. The Anthem was "Send out Thy light" (Gounod). After the service the Primate made a presentation, at the parsonage, to Mr. Wareham, on behalf of the members of the choir of All Saints', consisting of an illuminated address (containing sketches of the Church and Parsonage, and also of the new organ), signed by all the choir, and expressing their sincere regard for Mr. Wareham as their Choirmaster.

PONTYPOOL.—A Grand Musical Eisteddfod, in honour of the Queen's Jubilee, is announced to take place in Pontypool Park on Easter Monday, April 11. The Committee appointed to carry out this undertaking consists of the most influential persons of the neighbourhood, and the profits are to be devoted to building a fine Assembly Room, Free Library, &c. The prizes will consist of £200 and £50, the first accompanied with a gold, and the second with a silver, medal, for the best rendering of the chorus "Wretched lovers" (Handel); and £10 10s. and gold medal to the Male Voice Choir that shall give the best rendering of "The Soldiers' Chorus," from Faust (Gounod). The adjudicators will be Mr. Joseph Proudman and Mr. Venables (London), and the Rev. Gurnos Jones (Bridgend).

PORTMADOC.—The annual Concert of the string band took place on Tuesday evening, the 7th ult., before a large audience. The band played a Suite d'Orchestre (Lange), and the Overture to The Siege of Rochelle (Balfe). Mr. Theodore Lawson and Miss Annie Cantelo gave an excellent rendering of the Fantasia on William Tell, by De Beriot and Osborne, and were warmly applauded. Miss Cantelo also played Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" and "Perpetuum Mobile," and two solos by Walter Macfarren, in a most artistic manner. Mr. Theodore Lawson performed violin pieces, by Vieuxtemps and Wieniawski, and vocal solos were contributed by Misses Davies, Jones, and Williams, and Mr. Bennett Williams. Several choruses were sung by the Choral Society. Mr. John Roberts conducted.

POTTON, BEDFORDSHIRE.—A successful Concert was given in the Board School on the 16th ult., on the occasion of the amalgamation of the Orchestral and Choral Societies of this town. The band, under the leadership of Mr. Walter Robarts, played the Overture to Figaro, Andante from Beethoven's Symphony, No. 1, selection from Il Trovatore, &c. The Part-songs were well rendered, under the conductorship of Mr. E. Storr. Songs and Trios were given by the Misses King, Miss L. Edwards, Mrs. H. Brown, Mr. C. J. Pope, Mr. Houchin, and Mr. E. Storr.

PUDSEY.—On Monday evening, the 6th ult., the Choral Union gave the ninth annual Subscription Concert in the Public Hall. Handel's Samson was the work performed. The principals engaged were Miss Fannie Sellers, Mrs. Alfred Broughton, Mr. Tom Buckland (who replaced Mr. Joseph Wright, indisposed), and Mr. Charles Kingsley. Mr. H. Heap was leader of the band. Both chorus and band had received careful training from Mr. H. Roberthan, the Conductor.

RIPON.—Haydn's Spring and Mendelssohn's Loreley were given by the Choral Society on the 9th ult., under the patronage of the Bishop of Ripon. The soloists engaged were Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. J. Simpson, and Mr. J. H. Bayley, who acquitted themselves to the satisfaction of the audience. The choruses were excellently sung. Mr. Summerscales filled the post of Conductor with much ability.

SHEFFIELD.—On the 7th ult., Mr. Frederick Lamond gave a Pianoforte Recital, the programme of which was admirably chosen to display the exceptional powers of the young pianist, who was received most enthusiastically. Mr. William Foxon made his first appearance on the occasion, and achieved a marked success, his fine tenor voice and cultivated style being most advantageously displayed in all his songs. He was well accompanied by his brother, the Organist of Brunswick Chapel.

SOUTH SHIELDS.—The first of the Choral Society Concerts was given on the 16th ult., in the United Methodist Free Church, Queen Street, when Handel's Messiah was well rendered. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Mason, R.A.M., Miss Ada Batley, Mr. D. S. Macdonald, and Mr. T. Lewis Campion. The "Pastoral" Symphony was exquisitely played on the organ by Mr. Preston, who exhibited perfect command over the instrument, and the applause was so great that he was compelled to repeat the performance. Mr. Lloyd conducted.

STALYBRIDGE.—On Monday evening, the 13th ult., Mr. J. Buckley Thompson, the blind Organist, gave a Recital on the organ of the Wesleyan Chapel, Caroline Street. The programme included a March in B flat, by E. Silas, the Larghetto movement from Handel's Organ Concerto, Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata, No. 6, Guilmant's "Offertoire sur deux Noëls," in which a Normandy carol and the air "Adeste Fideles" are introduced; Saint-Saëns's Rhapsody, Bach's St. Ann's Fugue, "Lift up your heads," from The Messiah, &c. Miss Jessie Moorhouse, of Manchester, was the vocalist, and sang very tastefully "The children of the city" (Adams), "I know that my Redeemer liveth" (Handel), "Calvary" (Rodney), and "Angels ever bright and fair" (Handel).

STOURBRIDGE.—Miss Rosa James gave an evening Concert in the Corn Exchange on Friday, the 17th ult. Miss James was assisted by Miss Anna Lang, violinist, Miss Agnes McCave, Mr. Robert Grice (of St. Paul's Cathedral Choir), and Mr. Owen H. Powell, pianist. The Concert-giver sang with much taste Verdi's aria "Caro nome," and "Left untold" (with violin obbligato by Miss Lang), which the audience insisted on encoring.

SUTTON (NOTTS.).—Acis and Galatea was the work selected for performance by the members of the Sutton-in-Ashfield Harmonic Society for their Concert on the 14th ult., the second part of the programme being miscellaneous. Mr. A. H. Bonser conducted a band and chorus of about 100, the orchestra, of twenty performers, being principally from Nottingham. Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. C. Gerring, and Mr. W. Gadsby, were the solo vocalists, and were well received.

SWANTON MORLEY.—A Concert took place, on Friday, the 17th ult., when several vocal solos were sung and well received. The best performances of the evening were, however, the part-songs, "Sweet to love" (Pearson), and "O forest deep and gloomy" (Mendelssohn). Many encores were demanded during the evening.

TAUNTON.—The second Concert for the season of the Philharmonic Association was given on the 2nd ult., when Elijah was performed. The soloists were Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Marie Hayward, Mr. Theo. Taylor, and Mr. W. D. Powell, who all acquitted themselves most satisfactorily. The chorus-singing was noticeable for certainty of attack and perfect intonation. An efficient band was engaged under the experienced leadership of Mr. Michael G. Rice, and the rendering of the instrumental portion of the Oratorio was very good, the introduction more especially. Mr. T. J. Dudeney, L.R.A.M., F.C.O., conducted with his usual skill, and is to be congratulated on so excellent a rendering of the work.

TENBURY.—The Musical Society gave a performance on November 24, of Astorga's Stabat Mater, Schumann's Advent Hymn, and a selection of Glees, Part-songs, &c. The Rev. J. Hampton acted as Conductor.

TIBSHELF.—A Concert was given on Monday, the 6th ult., in the Schoolroom, in aid of the Tibshelf Colliery Band. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Mason, R.A.M., Miss Whitehead, Mr. Slack, and Mr. Bingley Shaw. Mr. Alf. R. Watson was solo violinist, and Mr. H. Houseley, F.C.O., was the Conductor. The singing of Mrs. Mason and Mr. Bingley Shaw was the principal feature of the evening.

TURNHAM GREEN.—A successful Concert in aid of the Permanent Church, Gunnersbury, was given in the Vestry Hall on Thursday, the 9th ult. Amongst the artists were Miss Lena Law and Miss Hilda Coward, both of whom received encores for their songs. The other vocalist was Mr. Harold Savery. Miss C. Bateman contributed a pianoforte solo, and Herr Poznanski two violin solos.

ULVERSTON.—An excellent performance of Handel's Messiah was given on the 10th ult., in Holy Trinity Church, by the Church Choir, assisted by friends. The soloists were Miss Alma Hallowell, R.A.M., Miss Dews, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, and Mr. William Bartin, all of whom gave great satisfaction, especially Miss Dews, who made a favourable impression by her excellent singing of the contralto solos. The band, under the leadership of Mr. Rexhime, of Barrow-in-Furness, was very efficient, and Mr. E. Dickinson played the trumpet obbligato to "The trumpet shall sound" in a most satisfactory manner. The choruses were well rendered and highly appreciated. Mr. F. W. Pinckney presided at the organ, and Mr. S. Atkinson, the Organist and Choirmaster of the Church, conducted.

WARRINGTON.—On Wednesday, the 22nd ult., the Musical Society (established in 1833) gave the first Concert of the season. An excellent band and a well-drilled choir, assisted by Mrs. Mason (of Coventry), Miss Monks (Warrington), and Messrs. E. Kemp and Frank May, gave a capital interpretation of Cowen's Sleeping Beauty, and of other works. Mrs. Mason sang with great firmness and vigour, and with that reliability which must enhance her acceptance with all concert directors. Miss Monks has an admirable and well-trained contralto voice, and uses it like an artist. Dr. Hiles conducted.

WARWICK.—An excellent performance of The Messiah was given by the Musical Society at the Court House, on Thursday, the 15th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Spinney, before a crowded audience. The solo vocalists were the Hon. Mrs. R. H. Lyttelton, Mr. T. Herbert Spinney, the Rev. C. E. Trehearne, and Mr. Thomas Horrex. Mr. Heden led the band. The choruses were given with great effect.

WATERBURY, CONN., U.S.A.—On Thursday evening, the 2nd ult., the choir of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, numbering thirty voices, sang A. R. Gaul's Ruth, under the direction of the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. Edward Witherspoon. The soloists, all members of the choir, were Miss Jessie Wadhams, Mrs. Edward Witherspoon, Miss Dollie Kyle, and Mr. Frank Tripp. The work had been carefully rehearsed, and both solos and choruses were finely sung.

WESTGATE-ON-SEA.—The Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Lloyd's Hero and Leander at the Assembly Rooms, on the 13th ult., the part of Hero being admirably sustained by Mdme. Clara West, and that of Leander by Mr. W. F. Amies; accompanists, Miss Blandford (pianoforte), and Mr. H. Walter, Mus. Bac. (organ); Conductor, Mr. E. J. Bellerby, Mus. Bac. The Cantata was followed by a miscellaneous selection.

WEST MALVERN.—A successful Concert was given in the Rev. Edward Ford's private chapel at Hillside, on Monday, the 6th ult., by the School Choir, assisted by Mrs. Tisdall, Mrs. Cole, Miss Ford, Mr. Dyke (of Worcester Cathedral), Mr. Elwell, Mr. Staples-Browne, and the Rev. R. G. Brown. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous. The Concert concluded with a Cantata, Jesus of Nazareth, the performance of which reflected great credit on the choir. Mrs. Tisdall presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Charles Ford at the organ; violin, Master C. Tisdall. Mr. W. H. Main conducted, and also contributed two organ solos.

WESTON-SUPER-MARE.—The opening Concert of the season was given by the Philharmonic Society, on the 16th ult., in the Victoria Hall. The works performed were Rossini's Stabat Mater, Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, and Gounod's "Nazareth." The soloists were Madame Eleanor Farnol, Miss Sylvia Simpson, Mr. Mason (of Exeter Cathedral), and Dr. Roxburgh. A small band was efficiently led by Mr. F. S. Gardner. Miss Ruscombe Poole presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. S. Cook at the harmonium. The works were exceedingly well rendered, the singing of Madame Farnol greatly contributing to the result. The choruses were sung with much precision and artistic feeling. The Society's Conductor, Mr. Edward Cook (of Clifton), conducted. The Concert was well attended.——An Organ Recital was given at Bristol Road Chapel, on Tuesday evening, the 21st ult., by Mr. J. W. Lawson, Organist of St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol. Miss Marie Gane and Dr. Roxburgh were the vocalists, and sang with admirable effect several solos by Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn.

WHITBY.—The Choral Society's performance of Samson, given in the St. Hilda's Hall, on the 13th ult., was a brilliant success. The solos were sung by Madame Tomlinson, Miss M. Tomlinson, Mr. Buckland, and Mr. Rickard. The band included Miss Brousil, Mr. J. H. Beers, and Mr. Dearlove. Mr. Kilburn conducted, and Mr. Hallgate had trained the choir, the bright and intelligent singing of which afforded manifest satisfaction to a crowded and attentive audience.

WILTON.—The Musical Society gave its fourth Concert in the Talbot and Wyvern Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 15th ult. The first part consisted of W. M. Hutchison's Cantata The Story of Elaine, the solo vocalists being Mrs. Sly, Miss Eva Yates, and Messrs. Hayden, Kirby, and Kelsey, of Salisbury Cathedral. Mr. J. T. Calkin led a very efficient orchestra, and Misses Eyres and Brazier presided at the pianoforte and organ respectively. The Cantata was excellently rendered and received with great favour. The second part was miscellaneous. The soloists above named contributed songs, several being enthusiastically encored. A clarinet solo by Mr. F. Carter was redemanded, and a similar compliment was accorded to Mr. L. Sly for his violoncello solo. The band and chorus were specially successful in Eaton Faning's "The Vikings." The Concert was the most successful yet given, and was again conducted by Mr. John M. Hayden.

WORCESTER.—The second of Mr. Spark's series of Concerts for this season was given in the Public Hall on the 13th ult. The programme consisted of selections representative of all phases of operatic music, and the performance was well-balanced. The principal vocalists were Madame Laura Smart, Miss Jones, Miss Hallwood; Messrs. Kirkham, Edwards, Heginbotham, Muir, Eaton Batty, and Josef Cantor.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Geo. Fred. Horan, Organist and Choirmaster to Trinity Church, Rathmines, Dublin.—Mr. Edward Dyas, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Thomas's Church, Dublin.—Mr. F. J. Read, Mus. Bac., Oxon., to Chichester Cathedral.—Mr. Henry Bond, to All Saints', Woodford Wells, Essex.—Mr. Ernest A. Jay, Organist and Choirmaster to the Wesleyan Chapel, Stoke Newington.—Mr. Arthur Fagge, to St. Philip's, Queen's Road, Lavender Hill.—Mr. William Curnow, Organist and Choirmaster to Great Queen Street Wesleyan Church.

THE SHIPWRECK

BIRMINGHAM PRIZE GLEE

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

MORNING.

'Tis morn, and the gallant bark bounds free,
In the joyous gale o'er a sunlit sea:
And the waves, as they merrily waft her along,
Welcome her onward with dance and song.
But a black cloud looms from the western sky,
And tells as it scuds of a tempest nigh,
And the sea-eagle screams as he flaps in the shrouds,
Like a warning voice from the bursting clouds.

THE STORM.

It comes! the storm! the shrieking, shattering storm,
With the thunder's crash and the lightning's flash,
'Mid the yawning skies and the wild waves' dash!
See yonder, that form—'tis the fiend of the storm!
How he whirls the good ship in the might of his wrath,
To the gulf where the foam surges white in his path!
And a wild cry rings thro' the tempest shrill,
As she sinks in the billows, and all is still.

EVENING.

'Tis eve on the waters:—an ocean of light
Bares its breast to the moon, rising gentle and bright;
And the stars, as they beam on the silvery main,
On the calm of its depths are all mirror'd again.
Ah, list! o'er the deep doth a melody sweep,
Now the storm fiend hath flown, and the waves are asleep;
Ah, list! o'er the grave of the true and the brave!
'Tis the mermaiden singing her dirge on the wave.

Price Fourpence.

The gratuitous loan of Band Parts can be had from the Composer, as also an arrangement of the Orchestral Parts as Pianoforte Duet, for use when a Band is not available.

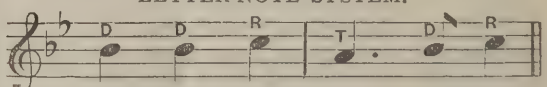
WILLIAM BLACKWOOD AND SONS,

EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

IMPORTANT TO ALL TEACHERS OF SINGING!!

THE SIMPLEST and EASIEST METHOD of Learning to SING AT SIGHT from the STAFF is the LETTER-NOTE SYSTEM.



COMBINING ADVANTAGES OF ALL NEW NOTATIONS WITH THE ACKNOWLEDGED SUPERIORITY OF THE STAFF.

Select List of Publications:—

ELEMENTARY SINGING MASTER, a complete course of Instruction on the Method. 80 pp., Cloth, 1s. 6d.; paper, 1s.

ELEMENTARY SINGING SCHOOL; being the Songs and Exercises of the above Work published separately for the use of Pupils. In two parts, price 3d. each, in wrapper. In this Work the letters are gradually withdrawn, training the Pupils to dispense with their aid.

THE INTERMEDIATE SIGHT-SINGER, and the ADVANCED SIGHT-SINGER, complete and systematic works of intermediate instruction. The music is in four-part harmony and short score, forming an accompaniment if required, but is so arranged that it can be sung in two parts by omitting tenor and bass. This arrangement in itself is of great advantage, as it adapts the works for Schools as well as Choral Societies and Evening Classes. In two parts of 16 pp., price 3d. each, in wrapper.

FOR GOVERNMENT, NATIONAL, AND BOARD SCHOOLS. The Letter-Note Method has obtained Government recognition, and Letter-Note pupils are entitled to have the Sol-fa initials appended to the sight-singing test supplied by the School Inspector.

THE CODE SINGER, for the use of the different divisions in singing under the New Code.—1st and 2nd divisions, 3d. each, or in penny numbers; 3rd and 4th divisions, 4d. each, or in penny numbers.

CODE SINGER—TEACHERS' EDITION. Containing the Code Examination Tests, with conditions and directions as to Examination by H.M. Inspector; also Educational Processes, Model Pointing and Ear Exercises, and Hints on Teaching.

Divisions I. and II., Teachers' Edition, including Code Singer, Nos. 1 to 6, in all 64 pages, price 8d.

Divisions III. and IV., Teachers' Edition, including Code Singer, Nos. 7 to 14, 80 pages, price 10d.

Liberal terms to the Profession. Complete Catalogue free on application.

RUTH

Words by EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

PERFORMED IN THE TOWN HALL, BIRMINGHAM, ON SEVEN OCCASIONS.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s.; ditto, paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 4s.

THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"To show the great popularity of Mr. Gaul's Cantata, 'The Holy City,' it may be mentioned that the rendering at Saltley Mission Hall, on Friday last, was the fortieth in Birmingham and its immediate environs since its production."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"The work is an honour to English art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"'The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

THE MONTHS

TWELVE VOCAL DUETS FOR SCHOOL USE

Words by EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are our special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The pianoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary pianist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

CONCONE'S LESSONS

WITH MARKS OF EXPRESSION AND PHRASING

BY

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence each.

50 Lessons for the Medium part of the Voice.

40 Lessons for Contralto.

40 Lessons for Bass or Baritone.

The sterling value and great usefulness of Concone's Lessons have been so long recognised and so generally admitted, that their extensive adoption caused, as a natural consequence, the issue of numerous editions in almost every country where the study of the Art of Singing is cultivated. No edition, however, which has hitherto come under my notice, seems to me as correct, complete, and reliable as it should be.

I have endeavoured to rectify this deficiency by adding in the present edition signs of expression and phrasing, where I considered it expedient to do so, completing, and in some cases altering, the breathing marks, and altogether carefully revising the whole work.—ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

Prospective Arrangements for the present Session: The Christmas Examination for Associateship and Fellowship will be held on the following dates, commencing at 10 a.m. each day—February 22, March 22, Lecture; April 18, Annual College Dinner; May 24, Lecture; June 28, Lecture; July 12, 13, 14, Examinations; July 26, Annual General Meeting.

A COMPETITION for the MEADOWCROFT MEMORIAL PRIZE ANTHEM is hereby announced: the amount of the Prize to be Eight Guineas; the works sent in are to be full Anthems, and the words are to be selected from the Holy Scriptures or Book of Common Prayer.

The Anthem sent in should be short or of moderate length, taking about five or six minutes in performance, of such a character as would make the successful work suitable for parochial use, and likely to gain general acceptation as an effective piece, and withal not a difficult work to perform.

The MSS. must be sent in on or before March 1, 1887.

This competition is open to all composers.

A Prize of Eight Guineas is hereby offered for an Organ Composition suitable as a Postlude for Divine Service, occupying from about six to ten minutes in length.

Through the kindness and liberality of the Hon. Treasurer, M. E. Wesley, Esq., a Prize of Five Guineas is also offered for the best Prelude or Introductory Voluntary to occupy about four or five minutes in performance. MSS. for these competitions to be sent in on or before March 1, 1887.

Members of the College only are eligible to compete for the Prelude and Postlude Prizes.

Conditions will be sent on receipt of stamped envelope.

E. H. TURPIN, Hon. Secretary.

THE CRUCIFIXION

A MEDITATION

ON THE

Sacred Passion of the Holy Redeemer

THE WORDS SELECTED AND WRITTEN BY THE

REV. J. SPARROW SIMPSON, M.A.

SET TO MUSIC BY

J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary parish churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, will contain the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

VOCAL SCORE, COMPLETE, ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

VERDI AND HIS NEW OPERA.

By the time these words are read Verdi's "Otello" will, in all probability, have been produced at the Milan La Scala. The sooner the better for public curiosity, which is powerfully excited throughout the musical world, and especially for the great mass of musical journalists who, from day to day, or from week to week, feel themselves bound to assume a knowledge though they have it not. The unfortunate persons in question cannot be congratulated upon the accuracy of their vaticinations with regard to "Otello." The secret of the work has been well kept under the stern eye of its composer, whose horror of anything like a réclame is notorious; and hence the journalists have had little or nothing to exercise their imaginations upon. Of course they have gone wrong; the Frenchmen especially, and apropos some of the Parisian newspapers are amusing reading. They gravely put forward all sorts of fantastic rumours, one of them even giving currency to such a "cock-and-bull" story as that Verdi, in his hatred of everything French, had determined to keep French instruments, such as the Sax family, out of his score and, consequently, out of his orchestra. "Why, then, does he retain the services of our Lassalle," indignantly demanded the Gallic organ; which should have put the question to itself as a corrective of its own credulity or wrong-headed fantasy. All this comes, we suppose, from competition for news. Journalists now-a-days cannot afford to wait for information flowing through its legitimate channel. They must needs go listening at key-holes, overhearing scraps of conversation, taking surreptitious peeps behind the scenes, and, as a last resource, when the story will not hang together, calling upon their fancy for facts. We decline to follow the example, and, therefore, frankly state that we know nothing about the new opera save that it deals with the story of "Othello," that the book has been prepared by Boïto, the poet-composer of "Mefistofele," and that the music has been written as a means of relaxation from the duties of a country gentleman, by Giuseppe Verdi, Senator of the Kingdom of Italy, landed proprietor and successful breeder of horses.

We lay stress upon Verdi's position as just stated, because his career is divisible into two powerfully contrasted parts. The first part embraces all the years of his musical activity from 1839 to 1867. During that period the master was a regular worker, and brought forth his yearly crop of music with comparatively few interruptions. There were ten barren years—1841, 1852, 1854, 1856, 1858, 1860, 1861, 1863, 1864, 1866—and eighteen productive ones, some of these being very fertile indeed. In 1844, the crop consisted of two operas; in 1845, of two; in 1847, of three; in 1849, of two; the same in 1853 and 1857. So far, we observe the labours of a professional composer, animated by the ambitions, and struggling with the heavy duties of his calling. But Verdi's life, from 1867, when "Don Carlos" was produced, till the present time, takes a very different complexion. He has left the open mart, with profit; retired from business; devoted himself to rural pursuits, and only resorts for relaxation to that which was once an employment. "Aïda" (1871) and now "Otello" are the product of leisure hours spent at the desk when garden, field, and farm made no pressing claims. The Squire amuses himself at composition. But even his amusement, as we have seen, is leisurely pursued. Sixteen years have elapsed since Verdi's last opera ("Aïda") saw the light, and it is now a very long time, comparatively, since rumour began to gossip about a successor. Of course there is no wonder in this. Old men frequently do for pleasure that which they once did for gain, but set about the task in the deliberate fashion born of feeble circulation and failing power. The true marvel is that we are about to receive an opera from a man seventy-three years of age. There are few parallels to this in musical history, and scarcely anything that can fairly be called a parallel in connection with the lyric stage. Auber's "Le Premier Jour de Bonheur" and "Le Rêve d'amour" were both produced after he was eighty, but all the difference exists between a light comic opera and a work of such proportions as "Otello." It may, no doubt, be urged that Verdi has taken a long time over his task, and that he is comparatively young for his years; but the fact remains that his achievement stands well nigh alone.

To our mind there is something sympathetic in the circumstances under which "Otello" has been written. To begin with, the master has worked at it almost on the spot where, with everything against him, he began the battle of life. An engraving of the house in which he was born is now before us, and shows one of the dwellings with wide low-pitched roofs which are so common in that part of Italy. The house presents its gable towards the road, with a door in the centre, having a window on one side. There are three windows on the floor above, while the slope of the roof to the left is so continued as to cover a kind of stable or out-house. A few trees shelter the little place, and in front is what appears to be a cultivated field or garden. In this dwelling Verdi's father carried on the business of a publican and grocer, but could hardly have been more prosperous than the peasants, his customers. The hamlet of Le Roncole is very small, and inhabited by poor people even now. What must it have been in the devastating years which opened the present century?—in 1814, for example, when Muscovite soldiers descended upon it with fire and sword, outrage and murder, and the infant Giuseppe was only saved as by a miracle. The son of the Cascina at Le Roncole was clearly handicapped in the race of life. What could be less promising than his youthful fortunes? As a boy the Fates were hard upon him. Twice he nearly perished; once he suffered from the brutality of a priest at whose altar he served; he began his musical career by playing the organ in the village church for four pounds per year, and when he sought admission to the Milan Conservatoire, submitting to the necessary examination, he was sent back rejected and humiliated.

The little village inn where life opened thus inauspiciously still stands, we believe, and not far from it is a handsome country house, surrounded by beautiful gardens, well-cultivated fields, and every sign of prosperity. The son of the inn-keeper lives there, as one who has conquered in the struggle for existence and for fame, and thence, as the slow fruit of dignified leisure, comes the new opera.

Verdi's present position is almost, if not quite, unique in the history of musical composers. Most of them have had to struggle on to the end, or, if not compelled to this, have chosen to remain in the full current of artistic life. We cannot now recall a single example, apart from Verdi, of an eminent composer withdrawing to rural life, and passing his last days as a country gentleman, given up to the petty concerns of a farm and a garden. This consideration heightens, and makes additionally interesting, the contrast between the tumble-down inn at Le Roncole and the Villa Sant' Agata. Verdi's present home is certainly charming enough to attract a man less averse from society and city life than its owner. Nature, to be sure, has done little for the country round about, which is simply an uninteresting though well-cultivated plain. But within the musician's boundary art has accomplished much. The master's garden receives his constant care and is a "place of delights." All the flowers that grow under an Italian sky bloom there in profusion; there, too, are rustic grottoes overrun by creeping plants, a lake and its offshoots, on which Verdi sometimes takes rowing exercise; avenues of trees, and all the graceful surprises of the landscape gardener. The house itself is a solidly built, rectangular structure, two stories high, and embowered in trees. At the front, three French windows open on the top of a short flight of steps extending the whole width of the building. Three windows are on the floor above, and as many smaller ones just under the "eaves" of the flat roof. The side walls appear to be supported by a row of narrow arches, wider ones running along in rear, where the domestic offices are situated. The interior shows more regard for solid comfort than luxurious display, though the master's library is rich in works of art sent as tributes by his admirers. But, indeed, the whole place indicates its possessor as a practical man, who keeps up a certain amount of state because it pleases him, and who never goes beyond his own requirements in order to make an impression upon others. Verdi lives a very quiet, methodical life at St. Agata, one day being very much like another. He rises early, spends the morning in looking after his garden, stables, and grounds, devotes a part of each afternoon to work in his study, goes out riding, comes home to dinner about 6 p.m., and at 10 retires to bed. So the current of the master's closing days flows equably on, in startling contrast to the struggles and agitations of his early years.

But the contrast just referred to is not the only feature which now excites sympathy. Though, at the moment of writing, his "Otello" is a closed book, the master's whole history invites us to believe that it contains further evidence of a progressive mind. Every student of his works knows that the Verdi of middle life is not the Verdi of an earlier period, and that the composer's advanced years have brought another change, exemplified in his "Aïda." With regard to this subject a good deal has been written. On the one hand, enthusiastic Wagnerians have claimed Verdi as a convert to the teachings of their master; on the other, it is denied that any change at all of a radical nature has taken place. For example, Signor Mazzucato, writing in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," says:—

"No doubt there is a great difference between 'Attila,' 'Ernani,' 'Rigoletto,' and 'Aïda,' but we submit that the difference is to be attributed to the age and development of the composer's mind, and not to a radical change in his way of rendering the subject musically, or to a different conception of the musical drama. The more refined expression of 'Aïda' compared to 'Il Trovatore,' and of 'Il Trovatore' compared to 'Nabucco' or 'I Lombardi,' answers to the refinement of musical feeling which audiences gradually underwent during the forty years of the artistic career of the great composer; he spoke a higher language, because that higher language had become intelligible to the public; but what he said the first day is what he always said, and what he will say again, if he should ever break his long silence."

The same writer remarks: "Let musical critics and philosophers say what they will, audiences in every quarter of the world will unanimously declare that the best opera is the one that amuses them best, and requires the least intellectual exertion to understand." He then suggests Verdi's preception of this fact, but his acceptance of it as a guide of action:—

"To deliver a lecture on astronomy before a select number of scientific men is quite a different thing from holding a course of lectures on astronomy for the entertainment and instruction of large and popular audiences: if one means to give something to another, one must give what that other is able to receive, and give it in the fittest way. This is what Verdi did during all his musical career, and his manner of thinking, feeling, and living made it quite natural to him. Verdi felt, much more than learnt, that rhythm, the human voice, and brevity were the three elements apt to stir, to please, and not to engender fatigue in his audiences, and on them he built his masterpieces. When choosing his libretto he always preferred plots in which the majority of the public could take an interest. . . In the poems of 'Traviata,' 'Rigoletto,' 'Trovatore,' &c., even the most learned men will have no trouble in bringing home to themselves the feelings of the dramatis personæ."

In these observations there is much that Verdi would decline to accept as a compliment, and we think that the writer has asserted too much in representing the master as waiting upon popular feeling, and carefully adjusting his art to the circumstances of the moment. We are, however, bound to add that Signor Mazzucato is supported by the evidence of Fétis, who says:—

"A man of intelligence, he does not trouble himself about the opposition of connoisseurs, and he knows that men of taste are always a small number, who can neither make nor hinder success. He has judged his age and country (for he is a thinker) and understands that the time for considering the essentials of the beautiful in art has passed. That of nervous feelings has come, and to nervous feelings he addresses himself. An examination of his scores permits no doubt on this point. All is arranged for effect, and for exaggerated, violent, exuberant effects; the unison of voices, the staccato of the orchestra, frequent changes of movement, forced and persistent rhythms, voices vibrating high up in their scale, incessant contrasts of colour—all in this music addresses itself to the senses."

This almost amounts to a charge of prostituted genius—a charge with which we have no sympathy. Our belief is that Verdi has always written honestly, and that his wonderful success arose from the fact that he is, or, rather, was some years ago, peculiarly a man of his time. More masculine and capable of stronger feeling than Bellini and Donizetti; of imperfect (in the sense of restricted) musical education and experience; a powerful nature which sought other than the ordinary means of expression, Verdi composed as was natural to him, and had the good luck to reflect the prevailing mood. But the early, rugged, passionate style has undergone a long course of modification, not because the public called for it—they distinctly did nothing of the kind—but because it was the natural outcome of extended experience, clearer perception, and a more cultivated artistic nature. Signor Mazzucato is quite right when he declares that what Verdi had to say at the outset he says now, but the manner of speech is altogether different. The rough strident utterance of the past has been toned down to the polished delivery of the present; but, happily, gain of artistic elegance has not been made at any great sacrifice of power and individuality. This brings us back to the point of sympathy with Verdi's present position. He is not likely in "Otello" to go back from the standpoint of "Aïda," and it is interesting to find an old man still progressive, still enlarging his ideas, and amending their expression.

Amateurs everywhere indulge a hope that "Otello" may turn out a masterpiece. Even those who are not among Verdi's admirers must wish for his last effort all the success that he himself desires. Poetic justice would be insulted by a failure, and the closing years of a great career be embittered by the feelings of one of whom it has been said that he "lags superfluous on the stage." Success, moreover, may give somewhat of revived interest to the lyric stage, now languishing everywhere, because popular works are worn out, and the popular taste is not yet educated up to the level on which classic masterpieces are a constant joy. The worst of the outlook is that Verdi seems to be the last of the giants. No one, as far as we see, is likely to continue the line. There are plenty of smaller men, but when Verdi and Gounod pass away, will any of them be qualified to occupy their places? But a truce to forebodings. Let us be thankful that the composers of "Aïda" and "Faust" still live, not only as men, but as musicians, and are yet able to do service in the cause of art. That is the proper feeling of the moment.

THE TROUVÈRES OF THE THIRTEENTH CENTURY AND THEIR SONGS.

IN the November issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES I gave a succint analysis of the Siena MS. Collection of Norman-French (Trouvères') Songs,* together with a brief sketch of the peculiar political and social conditions under which the lyric poetry of the trouvères began to flourish in the twelfth, and reached the acme of its glory in the thirteenth century; and so widespread, so lasting was the influence of that great "renaissance" period of music and poetry, that a few further remarks on the Artesian trouvères and their songs may not be deemed unwelcome. For the purpose of illustration, I shall, at the same time, append to this notice a few compositions transcribed from the original text and music of the Siena MS.†

One of the most remarkable features of that great movement—a "renaissance," a new birth, in the true sense of the term, rather than a mere revival—was not only its spontaneity, but its continuity; for, in spite of the constant wars of rival princes and political factions, it spread and progressed so steadily that the lyric muse fully shared the honours and triumphs which the sister arts of painting and sculpture won under the same varying and often adverse circumstances. As I pointed out in the previous notice, the sudden and extraordinary impulse imparted to poetry and music, first in Italy and Provence by the troubadours, and somewhat later by the trouvères in Northern France, was the direct effect of the thrilling and inspiring episodes of the crusades. The movement, as such, emanated, therefore, from the nobility and gentry. Having flocked to the East in search of heroic deeds and adventures, the crusaders returned full of poetical enthusiasm, and deeply imbued with the spirit and dazzling example of Oriental romance, whose leading characteristic, devotion to the fair sex, they extolled in glowing colours before admiring audiences, eager to adapt to their own society a novelty which was all the more attractive because derived from fabled lands, from Eastern poets, and imported into Europe by gallant Christian knights.

Every true knight must serve a lady—the lady of his heart, the soul of his delight. Such was the social maxim which, dating from the time of the crusades, endured for centuries. This gallantry, devotion, or passion, requited as often as it proved hopeless and even fatal, naturally found expression in rhyme and song; and hence it was that a true knight always aspired to being not only a lover, but also a poet and a musician. The vast majority of these cavaliers, we may safely assert, never rose above the level of mere amateurs, as successful in love adventures as they were in murdering music and poetry. Of these cavaliers we have excellent specimens in the Spanish "Cortejo," and in his Italian counterpart the "Cavalier servente," both of whom, moreover, forcibly remind us of Sir Tristram of old, ever ready to sing and play to his ladies, "not earnest, like a minstrel at his task, but with a sportive, careless, easy style." Of the "Cavalier servente," Byron's poem "Beppo" gives a masterly description in the person of the Venetian Count:

> And then he was a Count, and then he knew
> Music and dancing, fiddling, French and Tuscan;
> * * * * * *
> He patronised the Improvisatori,
> Nay, could himself extemporise some stanzas,
> Wrote rhymes, sang songs, could also tell a story.

Musical cavaliers of that stamp, it need hardly be said, have no more claim to be called "poet-singers" than those modern abominations, happily fast dying out, if not already defunct, the drawing-room singers of comic songs: Heaven forbid that the Muse should be degraded by such disciples. The troubadours and trouvères who graced the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and whose lyric poetry forms one of the great landmarks in the history of music, were men of very different artistic mould; as their art progressed, they came to constitute an honoured profession; and it is with them alone that we have to deal.

This brings me to the interesting, and, in its way, important question as to what, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, really was the social position of the poet-singers; and the inquiry seems the more appropriate, as on this point there is a good deal of misconception for which the vague term "minstrel" is in no small degree responsible. In the early and ordinary acceptation of the term, the minstrel—literally, one who ministers or serves—was very much on a level with the organ-grinder or street singer of our own day; he was classed with buffoons and mountebanks, if we may trust the spirited account which Whistlecraft gives in his "Interesting Particulars relating to King Arthur and his Round Table," written, be it noted, as recently as the eighteenth century.*

It will be seen that the poet makes a distinction between minstrels and singers, the former being players of instruments; and in this he but conforms to the Scriptural sense of the term: "The singers go before, the minstrels (or 'players on instruments') follow after." The altogether inferior position of the minstrel is further attested by the fact that in the feudal ages he was also called "juglar," or "jongleur," which term, though derived from jocularis, and originally equivalent to juggler, came to be applied both to singers and players. this we have an illustration in an authentic account which Ramon Vidal, an eminent troubadour, has left of a sumptuous banquet given at the Castle of a "mighty English Baron," whose honoured guest he was at the time. After describing the gaiety of the scene and the brilliancy of the company, consisting of "great nobles and beautiful ladies," he goes on to say: "The festive entertainment was proceeding, when, lo and behold! all at once a jongleur, good looking and well dressed, stepped into the banquetting hall; and, God save the soul of my fathers, if he did not actually walk up to our host and humbly crave leave to perform; and, this granted, he sang us many a song and recited many a tale."* Such, then, was the "juglar" or minstrel as understood in Provençal. That the term had the same meaning in Norman-French is attested by the records of a religious ceremony at Arras, founded on a curious tradition which dates from the year 1005. At that time Arras was ravaged by the plague; but the Virgin, "who loves the sweet sound of stringed instruments," appeared to two "jongleurs" or "ménestrels," Jtier and Pierre Norman, and presented to them a miraculous candle which was to drive, and did drive, away the plague.

La douce mère Dieu ama son de viele,
A Arras la cité fist courtoisie et bele
Aux jougléors dona sainte digne chandele.†

From that time the sacred candle, carried by two minstrels, always formed an important part of the annual procession of the earlier "Puys of Arras"; nay, at Valenciennes, on similar occasions, the youngest minstrel always carried a taper entirely composed of the drops which had fallen from the holy candle of Arras. In this sense, then, the minstrels or jongleurs were youths attached to the Cathedral, and probably combined the functions of choristers, players, and candle-bearers, and otherwise assisted at the religious services. In the fourteenth century the "ménestrels" had become so numerous that in large cities they occupied a separate quarter. Thus we read that, in Paris, their quarter was founded in 1331, by two "jongleurs," named Jacques Grure and Hugues Lorrain; and De Laborde, a distinguished authority, tells us, in his "Emaux," that in the fourteenth century there were "all sorts of ménestrels," to wit, those who went from castle to castle singing songs or reciting fables; then those who performed on instruments; these latter, again, were sub-divided into minstrels "great and small," according to the size of their particular instrument; and further, there were minstrels of the violin, the harp, the lyre, and the like.

However these definitions may vary in particulars, they establish one broad and essential fact—that, throughout the Middle Ages, the minstrel never had any place whatever in society; and it was not till the nobility and gentry, fired by religious and romantic enthusiasm, began to cultivate music and poetry that the muse, thus regenerated, was raised to the level of the sister arts and recognised in the polite society of the day. On the one side we have, therefore, the poet-singers—viz., the troubadours of Provence and Italy, and the "Trouvères" of Artois, Picardy, and Flanders; on the other side we have the minstrels or jongleurs; and the well-defined and rigidly observed difference between the two was as wide as that between a master and a menial, or a professional and a quack. True it is that the minstrels survived the poet-singers, as indeed they had preceded them; but even towards the end of the fourteenth, and the beginning of the fifteenth century, the jongleur, though he might be a "virtuoso," never rose to the social or artistic level of a trouvère; at the most he became a "bastard trouvère," and, indeed, marked the decline of Norman-French lyric poetry. It is, therefore, clear that the term "minstrel" is altogether inadequate, nay, positively misleading, when applied to the troubadours, trouvères, and, it may be added, to the "Minnesänger"; and that so unfortunate a term should be discarded, or at least limited to its proper meaning, is, in the interest of art, assuredly a consummation devoutly to be wished.

That the profession, if so it might be called, of the poet-singer, both in Provence and in Northern France, was an honoured one; that, in society, the troubadour and trouvère enjoyed special privileges, and that his acquaintance, nay, his friendship, was courted by the reigning princes of the time—of this the records of history, as well as the extant compositions of the poet-singers themselves, furnish abundant and indisputable proof. Among the troubadours, the very first whose songs are recorded is no less a personage than Guillaume II., Count of Poitiers, living in the eleventh century. Besides him I need only mention three of the most celebrated, whom Dante honoured with a place in his "Divine Comedy": Bertram, of Bormio, Viscount of Altaforte in Gascoign, who, besides being a famous warrior of the twelfth century, was also a poet-singer of the first rank; violent in hatred as he was ardent in love, it was he who, by his inflammatory songs, never ceased to incite John Lackland to rebellion against his father, King Henry II., to whose crown the County of Gascoign belonged at that time.

Equally famous was Sordello Visconti, of Mantua, whose stinging "Serventes," or satirical songs in Provençal, made him no less feared than his proficiency in arms; whilst Arnaldo Marvello rose to honour and fame by his "Lais," those sweet and plaintive songs of which Dante said that they were written in better Provençal than he himself could have written them in Italian. It is worthy of note that Dante himself, whose refined artistic taste and ardent love of music pervade his great poem throughout, admirably defines the difference between the poet-singer and the minstrel, viz., the player or accompanist, when he says:—

Come a buon cantor buon citarista
Fa seguitar lo guizzo della corda,
In che più di piacer lo canto acquista.‡

As regards the social position of the trouvères—and it is with them that we are here more particularly concerned—the historical evidence at our disposal is even more ample and instructive than that relating to the troubadours. One of the earliest and most eminent trouvères, Châtelain de Coucy, to whose tragic history in connection with his lady-love, Madame de Fayel, I alluded in a previous notice, was of noble birth, and, having assumed the Cross, died towards the end of the twelfth century. Blondel de Nesle is generally mentioned as de Coucy's contemporary, simply because the year 1193 was that of Richard I.'s captivity in the Castle of Löwenstein; but in the closing years of the twelfth century that well-known trouvère must have been as yet a very young man to undergo the hardships of his wanderings abroad in search of his royal friend and patron; and he may, therefore, more properly be classed with the trouvères of the beginning of the thirteenth century. At all events, the familiar story of Blondel, even when divested of the romantic surroundings with which it was clothed, first by Fauchet, and later on by the librettist of Grétry's opera, "Richard Cœur de Lion," is a striking illustration not only of the bonds of friendship that united a powerful prince and his trouvère, but also of the facility with which an accomplished and gallant poet-singer gained access to ducal castles and carefully-guarded strongholds such as Löwenstein, even though he came as a stranger. In his travels a trouvère, more especially if his fame went before him, was always sure of a hearty welcome; for, apart from his artistic merits, he was generally a knight of handsome presence, and excellent company; nay, in his intercourse with royalty, he enjoyed certain privileges, such as indulging in a joke or in gentle satire at the expense of his exalted host or patron; "he quaffed," as Béranger says, "his cup under the very nose of royalty"—

Au nez des rois vidaient gaiment leurs verres.

This immunity, however, had its limits; nay, history records that in 1124, Luc de la Barre, a noble cavalier and poet-singer, had his eyes put out by order of King Henry I., who was incensed at the trouvère for having dared to compose too biting a "servente" or satire on his majesty. This mode of wreaking vengeance, more worthy of an Eastern sultan than of an English king, surnamed, to boot, Beauclerc the Scholar, is, happily, an isolated case; and, certainly, the punishment seems so monstrous even for those days of arbitrary power, and so out of all proportion to the offence, that we may not unreasonably look for another motive, not indeed less inadequate, but one of a more delicate nature; for when, in those days, a favourite poet-singer fell into disgrace with his royal patron, the immediate reason was not infrequently the latter's jealousy in love; and, therefore, not improbably, in this case too, "il faut chercher la femme." Another instance of the high esteem which the trouvères enjoyed, is Adam de la Halle, surnamed "le Bossu," or hunchback of Arras, of whose extant compositions—thirty-three in all—twenty-one songs are preserved in the Vatican MS. of 1490. Living about the middle of the thirteenth century, he was, in spite of his bodily infirmity, one of the brightest ornaments of the Puy of Arras, and was the personal friend of Charles of Anjou, whom, in 1265, he accompanied to Italy in the campaign against Manfred, where, it is believed, he composed his "Roi de Sicile." As regards Charles of Anjou, he is described by Villani, the Florentine historian, as of a sullen and silent disposition, "little given to the pleasures of song and poetry"; nor is it improbable that such appeared to be Charles' frame of mind when in Florence, where he was surrounded by loquacious and factious intriguers, whom he distrusted and, therefore, treated on the principle that speech is silver, but silence is gold. But, on the other hand, we have it from French authentic and impartial sources that Charles was himself a composer of lyric poetry, and cultivated the friendship not only of Adam de la Halle, but also of Perrin d'Angecourt, Jehan de Bretel, Robert du Caisnoi, and other Artesian trouvères. Of the privileges which the trouvères enjoyed at the Court of St. Louis, Charles of Anjou's royal brother, it is needless to speak here, because the great artistic culture which distinguished that most excellent Christian monarch, and his enthusiastic love of lyric poetry, more especially that of a sacred character in glorification of the Virgin and of the crusades, are too well known. Among the distinguished trouvères who graced the Court of St. Louis were, notably, Gilles le Vinier, who assumed the cross at the same time as St. Louis, and Gautier de Dargies, a Picardie noble, of whose twenty-seven extant songs six are preserved in the Vatican MS., 1490, while a seventh is contained in the Siena MS. Robert I., Count of Artois, another brother of St. Louis, and his brother-in-law, Henri III., Duke of Brabant, also count among the illustrious patrons of lyric poetry; for we know that Adenès, surnamed "le Roi," a "crowned" and celebrated trouvère of the thirteenth century, resided alternately at the Courts of those two princes who were, moreover, poet-singers themselves; indeed, of the Duke of Brabant's four extant compositions, two numbers are preserved in the Vatican MS., 1490. Nor must I fail to notice, as by no means one of the least interesting cases of royal patronage in those days, the friendship which existed between King Edward I. and Lambert Ferri, another bright star of the Puy of Arras about the middle and second half of the thirteenth century. This celebrated trouvère, who excelled more especially in jeux partis, and frequently challenged and was challenged by Jean Bretel, the great Artesian champion of those contests, was, at one time, the Worshipful Mayor—then equivalent to local magistrate—of St. Liénart, the modern St. Léonard, near Boulogne; for by that title Bretel addresses him in a jeu parti preserved in the Vatican MS. of 1490. Again, in another jeu parti between Ferri and Robert du Caisnoi, we see King Edward I. and Charles of Anjou acting as judges, and Ferri calling on Edward to award the prize. "Edouard," says the trouvère—

Edouard chief des Englois,
Ferri vos amis courtois
Vous rekiert vo jugement.

The familiarity with which Ferri addresses the King, styling himself Edward's "friend," might appear startling, were it not that, on such occasions, a trouvère of Ferri's standing enjoyed considerable poetical license, and that, moreover, Ferri was probably the young king's senior by a good many years, perhaps had even initiated him into the lyric poetry of the langue d'oil. At all events, the friendly intercourse between the two must have dated from the time of Edward's youth, when the County and City of Boulogne, in whose vicinity, as we have seen, Ferri resided, were the frequent meeting place of the royal families of England and France.

As a striking instance of how high soared the ambition of some of the leading trouvères in their devotion to the fair sex, I may mention one of the two extant love songs of Lambert Ferri,† which is addressed to a "douce dame de grand nobileté," and pleads in the following strain—

Dame d'Artois, Comtesse d'onorance,
Oef mon chant que j'ai au Puy chantey.

There is good reason to suppose that this Countess of Artois, in whose honour Ferri "sang his song at the Puy," was no other than Matilda, Princess of Brabant, who, like her brother, Duke Henri III. of Brabant, assiduously cultivated lyric poetry, not only in her native Flanders, but also as the wife of Robert I., Count of Artois. For the rest, Lambert Ferri was essentially a bon-vivant, easy going, amiable, well met, and greatly given to gambling at dice, as appears from a jeu parti preserved in the Vatican MS., 1490, in which his adversary openly taunts him with being a slave to that vice, only too common in those days:—

Ferri, li jeus de hasard
A qui vous estes sougis
Vous a fait si droit musard.

In his peculiar artistic merits, as also in his social talents, and in his weaknesses, Lambert Ferri was equalled, nay, surpassed, only by his great brother-trouvère (the poet-singers always addressed each other as "Sire frère," or "Messire frère"), Jehan de Bretel, the "Prince" or President of the Puy of Arras.

* Vatican MS., 1490: "Robert des Caisnoi amis."
† Published by M. Dinaux in his "Trouvères Artésiens."

Chivalrous at once and unscrupulous, not infrequently even licentious in his sentiments, as expressed in his compositions, Bretel was the spoiled favourite alike of princes and of the fair sex; and such was his facility of invention and resource in lyric poetry, so bold and biting his sarcasm, and so extraordinary his readiness, both in attack and repartee, that, in his specialty, the jeux partis, of which no less than eighty are extant, he was, by common consent, the Artesian trouvère par excellence, of whom even his rivals could not but say, "with all thy faults we love thee still." Among Bretel's eminent contemporaries and friends, I may notice more particularly Jehan de Grieviler, who belonged to a noble and distinguished family of Artois, and chose "Messire Bretel" as his adversary in nearly all the twenty-nine jeux partis which he composed besides his seven extant songs; Jehan le Cunelier, of whose compositions seven songs and various jeux partis have been handed down to us; Phelipot Verdière, Guillaume le Vinier, Robert du Chastel, Gérardin and Prieus de Boulogne, Colart le Bouteiller, Adam de la Halle, as also Perrin d'Angecourt or d'Hachicourt, that being the name of his birthplace, near Arras; although some writers have pretended that this distinguished Artesian trouvère was born in Provence or Auvergne. All these brilliant poet-singers—with the exception of Colart le Bouteillier, who belongs to the end rather than to the middle of the thirteenth century—entered the arena against Bretel quite as often as they pronounced judgment under his presidency; and this, I may add, applies equally to the fair ladies who not infrequently took a conspicuous part in these proceedings; not only, be it noted, as judges, but even as competitors for the prize, as is proved by an extant jeu parti (in the Vatican MS., 1490) between "Madame Margot" and "Dame Maroie."

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By Joseph Bennett.

No. XX.—GLINKA (continued from page 14).

Last month we left Glinka studying at Berlin under Dehn, and haunted by thoughts of creating a distinctly Russian school of music. The course of instruction lasted less than half a year, but the time was turned to good account by the skill of the master and the industry of the pupil. Dehn wrote four little lesson-books for his Russian friend, into which was compressed all that he deemed essential of harmony, melody, counterpoint, and instrumentation. With these in hand, and the advantage of his teacher's constant supervision and criticism, Glinka made rapid progress. But the enlargement of his artistic horizon, and the development of his means did not turn him from what had become the fixed idea of his life. He resisted temptation to enter into the common field of music and labour there; preferring, with an instinct quite prophetic, to cultivate his art in the outlying and neglected patch that represented his mother-land. Throughout his tentative Berlin efforts, he restricted himself to the treatment of Russian melodies, and composed a number of pieces which afterwards found a place in opera. At this time, indeed, he contemplated a lyric drama having a Russian subject, written in the Russian language, and composed in a Russian spirit and style. The young musician was unquestionably right in setting this ideal before himself—right in principle as well as justified in result, since each country best serves the universal art by cultivating its own branch thereof. We would that the gifted youth of all nations were as faithful as Glinka in a matter so vitally important.

A letter written by Glinka to a friend in Russia is cited by M. Fouque as bearing upon the question just raised, and may be translated here with advantage:—

"My good S——,—You are wrong to complain of my silence. Friend has not forgotten friend. You are always in my remembrance; always near my heart. On the last occasion I wrote to you from Italy, whence you ought several times to have received news of me. I left that smiling land without too much regret. What will you? That joyous, animated, intense life, finished by disgusting me. The fault is mine in not being easily satisfied, for, to say truth, and modesty apart, I found many persons whom I could love, and received the most flattering proofs of sympathy that an artist can desire."

"I recall to myself 'Norma,' but at the present moment I willingly go to the Royal Opera to be regaled with 'Der Freyschütz.' And, being daily engaged with Dehn, I devote the greater part of my time to profiting by his counsel. . . . I shall not remain long here, and I cordially anticipate the moment when I shall embrace you. There is a project in my head—an idea—this is not, perhaps, the time to make a complete confession, and, if I were to tell all I should expect to see in your face the signs of incredulity. . . . Is it necessary to speak out? Well then, I think that I can, even I, give to our theatre a large and important work. It will not be a masterpiece, that I am the first to admit, but will not be so bad. What do you say about it?"

"The important point is to make a good choice of subject. In any case, it will be absolutely national, and not only the subject but the music. I want my dear fellow-countrymen to find themselves at home in it, and to know that here no one takes me for a vain-glorious and presumptuous person, who, like the jay, wears borrowed plumes."

"I begin to fear that I weary you in prolonging beyond measure a description of that which still lies in the limbo of the future. And who knows if I shall find within me the power and talent necessary to fulfil the promise that I have made to myself! Adieu."

M. Fouque comments upon this letter as follows:—

"There reigns in it a charming tone of modesty which gains our sympathy. Before all, the young amateur musician, now a real artist, fears one thing—to seem too satisfied with himself. But his démon worked upon him—the fixed idea would, at any cost, come to the front. One might say that a voice urged him onward, and that the muse whispered to him 'Thou wilt write Russian music.'"

During Glinka's stay in Berlin news arrived that his father had died. Upon this the young musician started at once for home, accompanied by his sister who, being in a weak state of health, took with her a nurse named Louise. Louise "was sufficiently good looking," we are told, "but had hands and feet of unusual size." Glinka appears to have been a man of taste in such matters, and he objected to the young person on account of her extremities; but, as no one else would undertake to guard the invalid through such a journey, it was a case of Louise or no nurse at all. "This circumstance," writes Glinka, "had a singular influence upon my destiny." The manner of it was as follows:—

The composer had become attached, during his Berlin days, to a young lady whom he was naturally anxious to see again. When, therefore, his mother and sister left Novospasskoïe for St. Petersburg, and it became necessary to send the nurse back to the Prussian capital, Glinka cheerfully undertook to act as her escort. All went well as far as Smolensk, where it appeared that the papers of the damsel with the large feet were not regular. A diversion to St. Petersburg in search of the necessary signatures became indispensable, and thither the two travellers repaired, putting up at the house where Madame Glinka and her daughter were temporary residents. There the composer met his fate, in the person of a young lady, Maria Petrovna Ivanof. It was a case of love at first sight, and violent love to boot. The Berlin enchantress was straightway dismissed from mind; poor Louise had to make her way home unattended, and a year later Maria Petrovna Ivanof changed her name.

The marriage turned out anything but a happy one. Maria was pretty, but frivolous. She cared nothing for music, had no sympathy for her husband's pursuits, and thought of nothing but balls, entertainments, and dress. Besides, she possessed a mother. Actually on his wedding day Glinka had been warned by a sympathising friend against the elder lady: "Don't let her enter your house." But who can be harsh under such circumstances? The young couple went to live with the elder lady, and then their troubles began. Deplorable scenes took place between husband and wife, into the midst of which the mother-in-law poured a volume of bad Russian; and at last came separation; Glinka went to live with his mother, and, after her death, became the care of a devoted sister.

Literary and artistic St. Petersburg was, at that time, animated by strong patriotic feeling. A general desire to assert the genius of Russia, and to devote all resources to her intellectual glorification, prevailed in the society of which Glinka formed a part. This, as may be supposed, encouraged his fancy for the production of a Russian opera, and at last induced him to apply to a literary compatriot (Jankowski) for a subject. The one decided upon was the devotion and heroic death of Ivan Sousannine, who made his name immortal under the following circumstances:

After the death of the Czar, Boris Godounof, the Poles invaded Russia and advanced nearly to Moscow, where they formed a design to entrap and carry off the new ruler, Michael Romanoff. For this purpose they ordered a peasant, Ivan Sousannine to guide a party to the abode of the Czar. Ivan pretended to comply, but secretly warned Romanoff of his danger and led the Poles into the middle of a trackless wood. Finding themselves cheated of their prey, the enemy killed the devoted Russian, who thus gave his "life for the Czar."

In laying out this story, Jankowski added a love interest in the persons of Ivan's daughter, Antonede, and her betrothed, Sabinine; and invented a sympathetic character in Vania, an orphan boy adopted by Ivan, and employed to carry the warning message to Romanoff. The scenario ended with a grand coronation in the Kremlin. Glinka was charmed with Jankowski's sketch. It supplied exactly what he wanted, and interested him the more because, as the second act was laid in the camp of the Poles, he could employ and contrast the characteristic music of both nations. The next thing was to find a poet who could write the words, and, eventually, the Baron von Rosen, secretary to the heir-apparent was chosen. "Rosen" says M. Fouque, "accepted the task willingly, but, in his quality as a German, he hastened slowly. Glinka, on the contrary, wrote in an immense hurry. The music was nearly always ready before the words, which the excellent Baron was then compelled to adjust to the melody, not without deep complaints and long discussions when the musician appeared dissatisfied. Glinka, whose creative fire burnt fiercely, composed everywhere and always—when riding, when in the country, when visiting, or in the midst of his family and friends." Having completed his task, the Russian composer did not hide the result from his friends. Parts of the work were soon performed in the drawing-rooms of the capital by artists connected with the Imperial Theatre. "You make my people sing," remonstrated the director, "in rooms where smoking goes on. You do not consider that this hurts the voice." The remedy, as M. Fouque points out, was to play the work on the stage, and to this the matter came at last. Arrangements were made in the spring of 1836, one of the conditions being that Glinka should renounce all his author's rights.

As the Theatre was under repair, some little delay took place—probably to the advantage of the representation; if not to the rehearsals which were carried on amid the sound of hammers. On one of these occasions the Emperor Nicholas attended, "Are you satisfied with my artists?" demanded the autocrat. "The zeal and conscientiousness with which they do their duty charm me," replied the composer, whereupon Nicholas sanctioned the dedication to himself of the new opera, which changed its name from "Ivan Sousannine" to "Gisn za Tsaria" ("Life for the Czar"). The first performance took place on November 27, 1836. Regarding it, Glinka writes in his autobiography to the following effect:—

"It is impossible to describe the sensations I experienced that evening, especially at the beginning of the performance. My wife and I occupied a box in the second tier, all those in the first being reserved for the principal officers of State, and the families of the Court. The first act went well, the trio was vigorously applauded. The second act, in which the Poles appeared on the scene, was played throughout amid profound silence. I had counted on the polonaise and mazurka, so keenly appreciated by the orchestra when they read it, and was frightened to observe the icy reception given to those pieces. On going behind the scenes, the son of Cavos, to whom I expressed a part of my feelings, said: 'Would you have the Russians applaud the Poles?' The remark only half re-assured me, and I remained a prey to lively perplexity. But the entry of Vorobieff (as the boy) dispersed all my doubts. The orphan's song, his duet with Ivan, the quartet, the scene in G major, produced an excellent effect."

"In the fourth act, the chorus singers who represented the Poles flung themselves upon Petroff with such force that they tore his shirt off, and he had to defend himself in earnest. As for the epilogue, the splendour of the spectacle, the view of the Kremlin, the crowds on the stage, the disposition of the groups, the life of the scene, filled me with admiration."

The curtain fell upon an immense success, and Glinka was commanded to the imperial box, where he received warm congratulations. But the Emperor offered one criticism, in the spirit of an ancient Greek; remarking that the hero should not be killed on the stage in view of the audience. Glinka assented, and the curtain afterwards fell before the deed was supposed to be committed.

Although the composer had signed away his author's rights of representation, he did not go without reward in the shape of hard cash. On the morning after the production he received from the Emperor a purse of 4,000 roubles. Profit also arose from the sale of the score and separate pieces, but this was as nothing to the sum which would have been Glinka's but for the condition insisted upon by the manager. The new work had, of course, to run the gauntlet of professional and amateur criticism. If Prince Odoiewski, writing in L'Abeille der Nord, said that "Life for the Czar" was a new inspiration and marked a new epoch, Tade Bulgarine issued a pamphlet, asserting: "In music there is no new inspiration, no new period; everything has been done that can be done." M. Fouque writes further in this connection:—

"Glinka had to triumph over another order of critics. At that time the nobility of St. Petersburg were fanatic admirers of Italian music. The idea of establishing a national music in Russia found no echo with them. They had profound contempt for popular Russian airs, and even to-day men of culture are not rarely heard to say, speaking of those national melodies, so characteristic and so charming in their free and poetic manner: 'It is the music of coachmen' (musique de cocher). Glinka, in his 'Life for the Czar,' did not entirely break with Italian traditions. However, Odoiewski was right: it was true to say that a new inspiration animated that opera. A national spirit showed itself there in a certain number of popular tunes textually reproduced, and especially in a general sentiment difficult to analyse, which was revealed in words and situations as well as in music. Those who belonged to good society could not appreciate this merit. 'Coachmen's music!' they disdainfully repeated. 'What does it matter,' answered Glinka, 'if the coachmen know better than their masters?'"

Society, however, was not wholly opposed to Glinka's work. Poets, literary men, and artists stood on its side, sung its praises, and helped much to decide the opinion of the nation at large in its favour.

Glinka was now on the high road to fortune; so true is it that nothing succeeds like success. By way of New Year's gift (1837) he received an appointment as chorusmaster of the Imperial Chapel, with an annual salary of 2,500 roubles, apartments at Court, and the further privilege—"not unimportant," says his biographer, "in latitude sixty degrees north"—of free coals and wood. The position was one of responsibility, the Emperor being very proud of his chapel choir, and with good reason, if we may accept Adolphe Adam's opinion, as quoted by M. Fouque:—

"Religious music is that which takes precedence of all others in Russia, because it alone is typical, and not, at least as regards execution, a copy of that belonging to other nations. The Greek Church admits no kind of instrument in its services. The singers of the Emperor's Chapel sing no other music than that of the Ritual, and, consequently, are able to perform, unaccompanied, with a justness of intonation almost beyond belief. But that which makes the effect unique is the nature of the bass voices, which have compass from the lowest A of the piano (this was written in 1840) to C above the lines in the key of F, and which, doubling the ordinary bass voice an octave below, produced an extraordinary result. These living double-basses never depart from their rôle as chorus-singers; their voices, isolated, would have an intolerable heaviness, but their effect in the mass is admirable. The first time that I heard this choir I experienced an emotion never felt before, and found myself in tears at the first bar of the piece; then, when the Allegro came with its animated motion, and these thundering voices opened all the artillery of their lungs, I felt myself shivering and covered with a cold sweat. Never did the most formidable orchestra produce such a strange sensation—one altogether different from any that I believed music could effect. The voices of the tenors are far from being as perfect as those of the basses, nevertheless they are very satisfactory. The sopranos are vigorous, and among the boys there are some fine solo voices. To sum up, the Emperor's choir has not its like in the world."

It is no wonder that, when Nicholas first met his new chorusmaster after appointment, he said:—"Glinka, I have one request to make, and I hope you will heed it. My singers are known all over Europe, they deserve all you can do for them. For God's sake, don't make them Italians."

Glinka entered upon his duties with great zeal. He subjected every member of the choir to a rigid examination, and put them all through a course of vocal exercises, at which they grumbled hugely. When more voices were wanted, in 1838, he started for Little Russia to seek them, travelling in an imperial carriage as a high functionary of the Empire, and being everywhere received with great distinction. This pomp and state led now and then to amusing scenes. In one town, where the mayor was expecting an official sent to make a judicial inquiry of some sort, the municipal chief came to Glinka's hotel, curious to discover the rank and character of the distinguished visitor. "His High Nobleness is asleep," answered to him Glinka's faithful servant, "and cannot be disturbed." Presently the mayor came again, with a thousand bows and cringes. Glinka received the good man pleasantly, and invited him to take tea, but had hard work to convince him that his mission was simply to hear the choir of the local church. Having obtained nineteen suitable boys, Glinka gathered them at his head-quarters in the house of a proprietor who owned 9,000 serfs, and had a complete private orchestra. There the lads were put through their paces before presentation to the Emperor. In due time they sang to his Majesty, who graciously approved, and expressed his satisfaction by giving his choirmaster several digs in the ribs of a character more familiar than regal. The same evening Nicholas met Glinka at the opera, took him by the hand, and promenaded with him as with a friend. This had one awkward result, "Like master, like man," and all the courtiers proceeded to dig Glinka in the ribs.

WOMEN AS COMPOSERS.

That no woman has ever been a great composer is an accepted fact; that she is never likely to become so, more than a probability. In these days, when woman has invaded so many fields hitherto occupied solely by men, one would think that the creative musician felt that he had a certain right to hold his head high among his brother lords of the creation, with a kind of Alexander Selkirk sort of complacency—

> I am monarch of all I survey;
> My right there is none to dispute.

But why is there "none to dispute" the right? Why should the creative faculty, displayed by women in other branches of art—poetry, sculpture, painting, and, most of all, fiction—be denied to them in music only? We may not have so many women writers of the first rank as men, but while we can point to Mrs. Barrett Browning and George Elliot, there is no disputing that women may possess the creative faculty with the pen in the highest degree. Miss Hosmer, Mrs. Butler, and many more prove that plastic creation is not out of woman's reach, why, in the name of all that is mysterious and wonderful, should musical creation be so? It cannot be out of "pure cussedness," for if the genuine lovers of music were polled—those to whom music is a real solace in trouble, a real occupation of the mind, and a growing resource—probably there would be found to be more women than men in the ranks. It is not sufficient to say: "It is just one of those odd things in woman, who is altogether an unaccountable creature, full of whims and vagaries." There must be a real reason for it.

We believe that the reason is to be found in the nature of the art itself. Music may be defined as an imaginative and emotional structure, built on a mathematical foundation. Now we all know that woman, as a rule, is not a mathematical animal; that is to say, figures, rules, proportions do not come naturally to her. Any school-manager knows the difficulty of getting a girls' school up to a high standard of arithmetic. In the higher education of women wonderful results are produced, it is true, with mathematics, but we maintain that it is done with effort. A woman must "go for to do it," to use an expressive slang phrase. Now it is this very effort which is fatal to the mathematical groundwork, which should underlie all music. It must be there because it could not help being there, "because it growed," in fact, not because the composer consciously took out his foot-rule and laid out his ground plan. I do not mean to say that a composer never uses the foot-rule, but the sense of proportion, the mathematical faculty, must be in him or his mental eye will fail to guide him somewhere or other, and he will fall into an analogous error with that amateur architect who built his house without a staircase. Of course, there have been women born with the mathematical faculty; at any rate, we have one instance to point to—Mrs. Somerville—but she really strengthens our argument, for her work, admirable as it was, was interpretive rather than creative.

But this is not all. We have still the imaginative side of music to deal with, and here woman's failure to create is at first sight more puzzling to account for. Most people would have no hesitation in saying that women were more emotional than men, and more imaginative too, if we exclude the very highest flights of the imagination. But here again we must carefully consider the essential difference between the nature of music and the nature of all the other arts. Painting, sculpture, architecture, poetry, and fiction are all "founded on fact," so to speak; all have a basis of imitation. The realms of nature and of humanity supply the models, set the rules, and inspire the motives of these arts. Of course, this does not prevent creation. A painter or a sculptor representing even a single figure has to express not only actions, but emotions. Thus he draws not only the bones and muscles which underlie the skin, and the hints beneath the drapery, but the passions surging through the heart. Is not this almost to create a soul as well as a body? The writer of fiction or poetry does the same, only that, as a rule, he lets you see more of the workings of the mind and soul, tries, in fact, to draw them, instead of only their outward expression, as is the case with the plastic artist. But the musician has nothing to go upon. The songs of birds, the ripple of the stream, the weird cadences, with never a close, of the Æolian harp, these all distract instead of help him. Nature does nothing for him, and humanity, as far as outward expression goes, still less. If you draw a leg or an arm anybody can see that it is a leg or an arm, supposing at least that you have mastered the alphabet of painting; but who shall recognise with certainty the special emotion which a musical work is meant to express, unless, perhaps, it were the calmness of despair, which is generally unmistakable. One man sees a lover's quarrel where another recognises a thunderstorm, and, as a rule, even so-called programme-music might fit half-a-dozen different stories. With all its mathematical foundation nothing is so indefinite as music. It is indeed the marriage of two wholly opposite essences, and, as in most true marriages, the more evenly balanced the incongruous elements are, the more complete the union. To obtain music of the highest order the composer must have an imagination touched to the finest issues and the true mathematical instinct. Rare such a union must always be, and with the relatively smaller area to choose from, for we suppose no one would deny that the average capacity of women is enormously less than the average capacity of men, such a case is most unlikely to occur among women.

So far we have been speaking of composers of the first rank, but, strange to say, there has scarcely been a woman composer of the second rank. With the exception of the two composed by the late Mrs. Meadows White, only one of which, so far as we know, has come to a hearing, we doubt whether there is in existence a single symphony by a woman, or many quartets besides those of the same lady. This is just as we should have expected. The composer of abstract music is one who launches out into a wholly foreign element, but it is possible to swim, if not with one foot on the ground, yet with some support in the way of a cork jacket or an oar. Such support, pace the shade of Wagner, is afforded to the creative musician by the writing to words, and we should therefore expect that vocal music in its two branches, opera and song, would be that found most congenial and in which they most excelled. This is precisely the case.

Dramatic works by women are not numerous. Many years ago that excellent musician, Madame Rudersdorff, was said to be writing an opera, but we have never heard of the completion of this work. So far as we know, the most successful operas by a woman have been those of Mdlle. Bertin. This young lady was an original character in more ways than one. She began her artistic career with painting, but would only learn in her own manner, and insisted on beginning with brushes and a canvas at her first lesson. By-and-bye she took to music, and Fétis, who was her teacher, gives a very curious account of the way in which her operas arose. "She was consumed with the idea of writing an opera, but would not hear of beginning with the study of harmony and counterpoint. She must be taught to write airs, concerted pieces, and overtures, as she had been taught to paint pictures, an original method of instruction, which her teacher was not sorry to make a trial of. Mdlle. Bertin noted down her ideas, which gradually shaped themselves into a piece of the required form, the harmony arranged itself in a similar manner, and the instrumentation, at first a matter of instinct, and full of unusual forms, ended by becoming a faithful representation of the young composer's ideas. Proceeding thus, there came a day when 'Guy Mannering,' an opera in three acts, was completed. A few friends met round the piano, and tried the work which had arisen in so singular a manner. They discovered in it great originality, degenerating occasionally into whimsicality and oddity, but above all a grasp of the dramatic situation marvellous in a woman. As the music became better known, for it was difficult, effects which had at first escaped unnoticed came to light, and a wish was felt to hear it in its complete form. A small theatre was fitted up in the conservatory of a country-house, an orchestra got together, and the result was astonishing, in spite of irregularities of form and harmony which offered large scope for criticism. This success, for it was one, decided the vocation of Mdlle. Bertin." Fétis goes on to tell how "Le Loup Garon," produced at the Feydeau in 1827, had a considerable success, though less suited to her peculiar bent than "Guy Mannering," or "Faust," produced at the Italiens in 1831. Victor Hugo adapted a libretto for her from his "Notre Dame de Paris" (1836), but this opera was not a success.

This history is curious from several points of view. Here is a woman composer making a success in her day which many a man might be satisfied with, and possessed, we are told, of a very real genius for music and true dramatic instinct. But this gifted girl is so deficient in the mathematical side of her development that she refuses to study construction at all, and her life's work is summed up thus in Grove's "Dictionary of Music": "Mdlle. Bertin's imperfect studies account for the crudities and irregularities to be found in her writings among many evidences of genius." A somewhat disappointing verdict on the career of one possessed of real genius.

There have been many women, less highly gifted with imagination than Mdlle. Bertin, whose constructive faculty has been proportionately greater, and their studies consequently more regular, and these ladies have written part-songs of more or less interest. Far the greater number of lady-composers, however, have devoted themselves to song-writing, and in this department have done good work. Without entering into detail on this point, for detail would be voluminous, we may merely mention the songs of Miss Maude White as admirable specimens of what women can do in this direction.

One word of consolation to musicianly women may fitly close this paper. If we may never hope to rank high as creators, we may do almost what we like as interpreters. Still more, we may love the art passionately, if not to us shall be accorded her highest favours. Time out of mind mankind has argued the point as to which is happiest—the worshipped or the worshipper; so, at any rate, we may consider it a moot question whether we, to whom music speaks in accents which we have cultivated our ears all our lifetime to understand, and which now thrill us to our hearts' core, whether for joy or for sorrow, are not equally blest with those to whom she shows herself a willing slave, and who bend her to their will.

In connection with the performance of Spohr's "Calvary," on the 1st inst., it may not be amiss to place before our readers some extracts relating to the first production of that work in England, at the Norwich Festival in 1839, an epoch which Spohr considered as the grand climax of his career, the reception which his works met with in England having, as in the case of Haydn, definitely set the seal upon his reputation in Germany. Spohr's own narrative of his life unfortunately closes in the year 1838, and the thread thus interrupted was taken up by his wife and family. The entertaining flavour of the autobiography proper disappears to a great extent with this change, but the circumstances of his visit to England are not without an interesting and even amusing side. In the beginning of September, 1839, Spohr, then in the fifty-sixth year of his age, set out from Cassel to Norwich, breaking his journey for a few days in London. The correspondence relative to his coming had been conducted by Dr. Taylor, the musical director of the Festival; and, in the words of the Spectator of that date, "it is highly to the credit of the great master that, to the question what compensation he required for the time and exertions required of him during the journey, and for direction of the Oratorio, he simply replied, 'The Committee will doubtless have no objection to pay my travelling expenses.'" It is satisfactory to learn that the Committee marked their sense of this modest request by presenting Spohr with an honorarium of 100 guineas over and above his expenses. On the morning after his arrival in Norwich, he was conducted by the Mayor to attend service in the Cathedral. The situation was not devoid of embarrassment, as the following extract will show: "If Spohr had understood the English language, the impression made upon him by the divine service would perhaps have been greatly disturbed by the circumstance that the sermon preached upon the occasion was in great measure levelled against his Oratorio. Already, before his arrival in Norwich, several persons of the puritanical party had raised their voices against its performance, and endeavoured in every way, both in print and in the pulpit, to show that it was profane and sinful to make so sacred a subject as the sufferings and death of Christ a theme for music. It thus happened that, on the Sunday morning on which Spohr visited the Cathedral, a zealous clergyman considered it his duty to hurl a crushing discourse against his Oratorio . . . and at the conclusion implored his hearers not to surrender their souls for one day's pleasure, but to stop away from its performance." The Monthly Chronicle further observes on the subject:—"We now see the fanatical zealot in the pulpit, and sitting right opposite to him the great composer, with ears happily deaf to the English tongue; but with a demeanour so becoming, with a look so full of pure good will, and with so much humility and mildness in his features, that his countenance alone spoke to the heart like a good sermon." In spite of this unpromising augury the Oratorio achieved a complete success. Before this, however, Spohr appeared at the first Concert as a soloist in his Concertino "Sonst und Jetzt," and, as one of the audience, was "inexpressibly delighted" with the performance of the second and third parts of "Israel in Egypt," remarking that "English church-singers only are capable of rendering Handel's sublime music in all its grandeur." The chief interest excited by the Festival naturally centred in Spohr's own work, which evidently created a profound impression, to which result the composer's masterly conducting no doubt largely contributed. The Oratorio was listened to in reverent silence, but, at the evening Concert, on his entering the orchestra to conduct his "Faust" Overture, he was greeted with loud and long-continued applause, "by which, doubtless, the audience expressed their sense of admiration of his Oratorio which, according to English custom, could not be applauded at the time of performance." Spohr was at once commissioned to write an Oratorio for the next meeting, in 1842, an engagement which was fulfilled by the composition of "The Fall of Babylon," a work which he was himself unable to conduct owing to the refusal of leave of absence by his Prince. It is greatly to be regretted that no better translation of Spohr's amusing autobiography exists than the angular version published by Longmans in 1865, full of Teutonic turns of expression—as the above extracts sufficiently indicate—not to mention numerous inaccuracies.

Professions of strict impartiality are not infrequently the precursors of the most aggressive criticism. This, within certain limits, is applicable to the interesting study of Gluck by M. René de Récy in a recent issue—that of January 1—of the Revue des Deux Mondes. To acquiesce in the extravagant claims advanced on behalf of their idol by the Gluckists, from Burney to Berlioz, is doubtless difficult; but to minimise his achievements, to regard him as occupying an isolated position, and as the preacher of barren dogmas rather than of fruitful ideas, seems to us an equally untenable position. It is difficult, argues M. de Récy, to connect Gluck with the evolution of the art. "He has neither the ingenuous candour of the early masters nor the perfection of the classics, nor the restless melancholy of the moderns." It is impossible to reduce him to any category. Gluck's faulty science, he continues, has been conclusively established by the researches of Mdlle. Pelletants. The attempt to lay his blunders at the door of his copyists breaks down, and Handel's often-quoted strictures upon his ignorance of counterpoint are largely borne out. M. de Récy then proceeds to a chronological survey of Gluck's operas, laying stress on the curious alternations of reform and retrogression which occur throughout his whole career. After his "Telemacco," in which the notable innovation of connecting songs with musical dialogue so as to form real scenes first occurs, a long period of retrogression supervenes, and M. de Récy points out, in illustration of Gluck's enigmatical character, the calmness with which—supposing him to have had a pre-conceived plan of reform in his head—he sat down to await the providential advent of a suitable librettist. He considers the "Alcestis" a falling off from the "Orpheus"—the choice of which latter subject he pronounces a stroke of genius. "Paris and Helen," according to our reviewer, is little better than a pasticcio, a mixture of banalités and exquisite ideas. The famous preface to "Alcestis" fares hardly at the hands of M. de Récy, who sees in it the disposition to erect into an æsthetic rule or dogma a method which had proved successful in one instance. These prefaces he holds to be a sign of weakness, as though no wise man conscious of his being in the right would condescend to give reasons for his conduct. The remainder of the article is largely devoted to an attempt to prove that Gluck owed his success, above all, to his policy of opportunism, to his adroit manœuvring, and the skill with which he encouraged his partisans in the famous quarrel with the adherents of Piccini. Furthermore, it was just at the very time when Gluck, now in his "third period," was posing as a great reformer, that he borrowed most freely from his works written in the Italian manner. His "inspirations" at the eleventh hour would, if carefully scrutinized, all resolve themselves into this skilful plagiarism from himself. In "Armida," it is true, says M. de Récy, he took a new departure, carrying the melody into the orchestra so as to leave the declamation more free; but in the "Iphigenia in Tauris" he reverted to the former method, relying for his attractiveness on an unusual number of airs; upon which M. de Récy adds, "En plein opéra Français, á l'apogée de sa troisième manière, c'est encore et seulement par ce dernier reste de tradition italienne que Gluck est demeuré musician." In fine, Gluck was a genius but not of pure descent nor worthy to be taken as a model. However widely we may dissent from these conclusions, it is impossible to deny the ingenuity of the writer's arguments. It is well for him, however, that Berlioz is not alive to retort in language compared by his contemporaries to a "poisoned dagger."

We are constantly receiving letters from indignant professors of music complaining of the terms offered to artists for their services, more especially by those who desire to enlist the talents of accredited organists and choirmasters for churches and chapels, where it is desired that the music shall be at least respectably performed. The following is amongst the advertisements of this class recently forwarded:—"Steady young man, to take charge of the choir at —— United Methodist Chapel, and to preside at the harmonium. Salary £3 per annum." The correspondent who sends us this adds:—"I think this specimen is quite up to the average standard of absurdities you have previously commented on." Undoubtedly it is; but it must be remembered that those who proffer such a salary are not themselves musicians, and simply purchase art as they would purchase any other commodity, in the cheapest market; and that a very cheap market does exist may be proved by an advertisement clipped from a provincial newspaper:—"A gentleman desires pupils for the piano; terms 9d. per hour." When to this we add our own testimony that in the Metropolis, and at an "Academy" with a high-sounding name, instruction is given at a shilling a lesson, that two subjects are taught "for the price of one"; and that, as the professor understands phrenology, "marvellous aid is rendered to the pupil," purchasers may feel tolerably sure that "no reasonable offer will be refused." We can scarcely expect that the world will value an artist at a higher rate than he values himself.

Some of our daily contemporaries devoted considerable space to notices of M. Paladilhe's new opera "Patrie," in advance of the performance. We do not disparage the enterprise thus shown, but the composer should be especially grateful for consideration which cannot have its basis in three previous failures. The present state of the French lyric stage has light thrown upon it when so much fuss is made over a work by a musician no more famous than Paladilhe. "Patrie" does not mark a turn in the tide. We sincerely regret this, because every country loses by the drying up of an old established and valuable source of supply such as that to which Auber, Boieldieu, Hérold, Grétry, David, and Berlioz contributed.

The General Committee of the Norwich Musical Festival met on the 8th ult., and the Secretary reported progress with regard to the celebration in October next. He had to say that Mr. Randegger would again discharge the functions of Conductor, having "shown himself most zealous and devoted in furthering the interests of the Festival." No "lengthy new oratorio" would appear in the programme; the Committee having resolved to rely mainly upon the performance of standard works by well-known composers." This may not be quite the policy we should desire, but it is difficult for people at a distance to criticise the action of a Festival Committee, who know the wishes of their locality. If Norfolk amateurs prefer standard works to new compositions, we may regret their taste, but cannot say that it should not be indulged at their own Festival. The Committee, however, do not exclude all novelties, and it was announced that arrangements had been made to produce two cantatas, or short oratorios:—"Isaiah," by Mancinelli, and "The Garden of Olivet," by Bottesini.

In supporting the choice of these works, the Sheriff said that Signor Mancinelli was "looked upon as the Richter of Italy," and that Mr. Randegger had spoken of Bottesini's Oratorio as "extremely interesting, and one which would please a Norwich audience." Apart from any question of merit, the choice of two Italian composers is certainly remarkable, and, perhaps, unique in the annals of English Festivals. We say nothing whatever against it, results will decide for wisdom or unwisdom; but a Norwich contemporary is not disposed to await results before having a say on the matter. He observes: "What superiority Signor Mancinelli possesses over such composers as Mackenzie, Goring Thomas, and Cowen is not very evident, unless it be the recommendation of novelty, which he has in singularly full measure. The same remarks might be applied, in a modified sense, to Signor Bottesini, who is known to the English public less as a composer than as an unrivalled performer upon the double-bass." Into the questions thus raised it would be profitless to enter. Besides there is decided interest in anticipating sacred cantatas from Italian sources. It is not often that such things challenge attention in this country.

The Committee further announce the following works: Sullivan's "Golden Legend," Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," Berlioz's "Faust," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Cherubini's Fourth Mass, Saint-Saëns's Nineteenth Psalm, and Handel's "Messiah"—on the whole, a very good selection, though "Elijah" is left out in the cold. The principal artists at present engaged are Madame Albani, Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. October 11, 12, 13, and 14 are the appointed days of the Festival, which will have the Prince of Wales as President, though his Royal Highness is not expected to attend in person.

The recently published memoirs of Count Beust, at one time Prime Minister of Saxony, makes a curious revelation with regard to Richard Wagner. The Count states that he once challenged the composer with having, during the revolutionary fever in Dresden, actually set fire to the palace of his master, the King. Moreover, Count Beust reminded Wagner of the existence of a paper in which the chef d'orchestre of the Royal Opera boasts of his deed. It is added that Wagner did not deny the impeachment. The Bayreuth master in the rôle of an incendiary is a novel spectacle, but we can hardly call it a surprising one. Wagner was never a man of half measures. When he descended into the streets with the Dresden mob, and fought the King's troops from behind a barricade, his blood was up, and a man then needs but a slight impulse to make him use a weapon other than the musket. Doubtless Count Beust's statement will be enquired into by the master's friends, who can hardly permit him to occupy a place among dynamitards and petroleurs without investigation.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The work of this Society during the past month calls for no more than brief notice. Only two Concerts were given, and one of those was devoted to Handel's "Messiah," about which it would be almost offensively superfluous to speak. The Saxon master's great Oratorio was given, in honour of Christmas, on New Year's Day, and, as usual, attracted a vast audience. Miss Robertson, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Henschel were the principal soloists; the band and chorus were in excellent form, and lovers of "The Messiah" enjoyed a treat for which they had reason to be grateful.

The second Concert (19th ult.) brought with it a repetition of Sullivan's "Golden Legend," and an addition to the Society's repertory in the shape of Stanford's "Revenge," which had before been given only once in London—at Novello's Concerts. An immense audience, computed at 10,000 persons, attended to hear these Leeds novelties, and were well rewarded. The solos in the "Golden Legend" had been entrusted to Madame Albani, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Vaughan Edwardes, and Mr. Henschel; this being a marked change from the usual (Leeds) cast. Both advantages and disadvantages resulted. If Miss Hope Glenn did not make us forget Madame Patey, the timbre of Mr. Henschel's voice enabled him to do more justice to the music of Lucifer than was possible to Mr. F. King. Mr. Henschel fairly made himself heard through the heavy accompanying instrumentation, and, we need not say, gave the Fiend's solos with appropriate as well as powerful expression. Madame Albani and Mr. Lloyd were, as usual, perfect in their respective parts. The work of the chorus and orchestra was done much as on a previous occasion, and once more gave entire satisfaction. Sir Arthur Sullivan attended, but took a seat among the audience, leaving the direction of his Cantata to Mr. Barnby, and finding reason therewith to be content. Mr. Stanford's "Revenge" received a no less meritorious interpretation. The well-trained choir sang as though "on their mettle," and, with the orchestra, called forth positive enthusiasm among the audience, whose thundrous approval was something to hear.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

It is a noteworthy fact that, while the number of great sacred works which may fairly be said to be popular has largely increased within the last few years, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" has lost none of its hold on the public mind. On the occasion of the above Society's annual performance on the 21st ult., St. James's Hall was filled with a brilliant audience, not a seat being vacant anywhere. It is satisfactory to find popular opinion in such a healthy condition; sympathies have widened and extended, they have not merely shifted, and the most enthusiastic Mendelssohn worshippers will not object to musical amateurs being on with new loves, seeing that they are not off with the old. The rendering of "Elijah," under Mr. W. H. Cummings, was of average merit. It was not absolutely without flaw, as there was unsteadiness at times in the orchestra; but nothing was done that could be termed discreditable to the Society. Mr. Santley, who has been singing with renewed power lately, was in splendid voice, and has never interpreted the part of the Prophet with greater power and dramatic force. Of Miss Anna Williams and Madame Patey it is surely unnecessary to say one word. The tenor airs were entrusted to Mr. Fredericks, a vocalist with a small but well-trained voice, the impression he created being fairly favourable. Miss Mary Beare and Madame Baxter were very acceptable in music generally allotted to the second quartet of soloists. Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" will be revived on the 25th inst.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The musical gourmand has to fast in spite of himself during what is known as the "festive season" of Christmas, and the immense attendance when St. James's Hall re-opened its friendly doors on Saturday, the 8th ult., was partly to be accounted for on the general ground of public eagerness for the resumption of the season's work. At any time, however, Beethoven's Septet is an attraction, and there were other items in the programme which, added together, made up a wonderfully enjoyable Concert. Haydn's genial Quartet in G (Op. 54, No. 2) at once put the audience in good humour, and Mr. Mackenzie's very clever "Pedlar's Song," being a setting of some verses ascribed to Shakespeare, made its full effect as sung by Mr. Santley. A warm reception was accorded to Mr. Charles Hallé on his first appearance after his severe illness, and it was quickly proved that he had fully recovered possession of his manipulative powers, his rendering of Schumann's beautiful but difficult Fantasia in C (Op. 17) being in every respect admirable. The executants in the Septet were Madame Néruda, Messrs. Straus, Lazarus, Paersch, Wotton, Reynolds, and Piatti, and it is needless to add that with such artists Beethoven's masterpiece received a faultless interpretation.

An unpleasant contrast was afforded on the following Monday evening, the attendance being one of the smallest on record. We have not far to seek for a cause of this discouraging state of things; the programme did not contain a pianoforte solo, and one of the most valued features of a Monday Popular Concert was therefore missing. The piano solo is naturally regarded with special favour by amateurs; concerted works may be loved for their own sake, but a Sonata of Beethoven or a Nocturne of Chopin, played by one of the best artists of the day, is an excellent lesson to those who are still in a state of pupilage. Schubert's Quartet in D minor pleased as much as ever, and there was certainly no lack of applause for the performance of Beethoven's Sonata in G minor (Op. 5, No. 2), for piano and violoncello, by Miss Zimmermann and Signor Piatti, or for that of Mozart's Duet in B flat, for violin and viola, by Madame Néruda and Herr Straus. Mr. Thorndike being absent through illness, Miss Carlotta Elliot proved a welcome substitute as vocalist, her rendering of songs by Franz, Gounod, and others being extremely refined and charming.

The spring season has commenced with a rush of new pianists, and among them is Señor Cor de Lass, who made his first appearance at St. James's Hall at the Concert of Saturday, the 15th ult. His style of playing offers the greatest possible contrast to that of the young Teutonic artists who have recently appeared, being, if possible, more delicate than that of M. de Pachmann. That being so, his choice of two pieces by Chopin had much to commend it; one was the little known posthumous Polonaise in G sharp minor, said to have been composed when Chopin was fourteen years old; but a better test of the pianist's powers was afforded in the familiar Ballade in A flat. In this Señor Cor de Lass showed a very light musical touch and rapid execution, the latter, however, not being so clear and crisp as it might have been. The reception accorded to the new comer was decidedly favourable, but scarcely enthusiastic. We reserve more definite opinions concerning his artistic claims until another opportunity arises. Madame Néruda played some violin solos by Wieniawski, and the concerted works in the programme were Mozart's Quintet in G minor and Rubinstein's Trio in B flat (Op. 52), both masterpieces in their way. We have already spoken of Mrs. Henschel's delightful rendering of Liszt's "Die Lorelei," and the charming vocalist was equally acceptable in two of Mendelssohn's Lieder.

A strong programme was put forward on the following Monday, but it failed to draw a very large audience. Two of Beethoven's finest chamber works—the Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3), and the Sonata in A (Op. 101), together with Schubert's glorious Trio in E flat (Op. 100), ought to satisfy the most exacting lovers of music. The last-named work was for a long time neglected in favour of the lighter but far inferior Trio in B flat, but it is now taking the place due to it as one of the composer's most beautiful inspirations. The performance, by Miss Fanny Davies, Madame Néruda, and Signor Piatti, was absolutely perfect, and very few stirred before the last chord had been struck. Miss Davies seemed slightly out of her element in the Beethoven Sonata. Her rendering was unexceptionable in a technical sense, but it lacked distinctiveness and character. Beethoven's later works need power as well as refinement for their proper interpretation. More charming vocalisation has never been heard at these Concerts than that afforded by Mrs. Henschel in an air, with flute obbligato, by Rameau, and two of Brahms's Lieder.

Schubert's Ottet having been twice given before the Monday subscribers, it was but fair to present it to that larger section of the public which finds the Saturday performances more convenient to attend. It need hardly be said that the room was crammed on the 22nd or that the enthusiasm of the audience was as great as its numbers were imposing. Additional strength was given to the programme by Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, and the appearance of Mr. Santley as vocalist. The veteran baritone introduced a refined and pleasing sacred song, "At morn, at noon," by Ethel Harraden, being a setting of lines by Edgar Allan Poe. The pianist was Miss Mathilde Wurm, and her selection Chopin's Fantasie Impromptu in C sharp minor. This is not a sufficiently important piece to enable us to judge decisively as to her merits, and we shall wait for another opportunity before speaking of her in a critical sense.

Beethoven's Septet was the pièce de résistance on the following Monday, and, as usual, drew an audience considerably above the average. The programme commenced with Schubert's fragment of a Quartet in C minor, in other words an Allegro assai, composed in 1820, in first movement form, and more characteristic of the master than any of the earlier quartets. The manuscript, in the possession of Brahms, includes forty bars of an Andante in A flat (the orthodox key for the slow movement of a work in C minor), but then the composer stopped short, as he did two years later in that far superior symphonic fragment in B minor. There was no pianoforte solo, but Mdlle. Olga Néruda joined her sister in Brahms's Sonata in G, for piano and violin (Op. 78), and a singularly charming performance of the work was given by the two ladies. Mr. Henry Piercy lost favour with a portion of the audience by arriving late, but he did his best to atone for this breach of etiquette by singing, with much delicacy and expression, airs by Gluck, Schubert, and Rubinstein.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

These Concerts were resumed, after the Christmas recess, on the 12th ult., when an interesting programme attracted an unusually large audience. There was, however, only one novelty, and that not of first-class importance, namely, a short Suite for strings, the work of Mr. Arthur Foote, an American professor, resident in Boston. It consists of three brief movements, tuneful and well written, but otherwise wanting in very special qualities. Mr. Foote has composed much better things for the chamber, and by them, no doubt, he would prefer to be judged by English connoisseurs. Nevertheless, his obligation to Mr. Henschel is great. The "Egmont" and "Tannhäuser" Overtures, and the "Reformation" Symphony, represented familiar works in the programme, which also contained a scena from M. Massenet's "Herodiade," sung by Miss Annie Marriott, and Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A, solo by Mr. Stavenhagen, who fairly astonished his audience by a wonderful display of executive power. Amateurs are now well enough acquainted with the Concerto to know what demands it makes upon the principal performer, and to estimate what is meant when we say that the young artist made light of all its difficulties, and accomplished his task with hardly a note out of place. He was immensely applauded. The Symphony, which is now too seldom heard, had an admirable rendering, as indeed had all the orchestral pieces.

At the eighth Concert (the 19th ult.) the novelty was a Violin Concerto by Mr. Oliver King, who conducted its performance in person. Of the three movements into which the work is divided the second is by far the best. In it Mr. King rises to a high pitch of excellence; melody, harmonic treatment, orchestration, and development are all admirable and effective. The movement shows what Mr. King can do at his best, and makes the revelation quite satisfactory. The Finale, in Hungarian style, comes next in order of importance, and after it the first Allegro, which the composer would do well to revise, cutting out a lot of ineffective solo work, and, while shortening the movement, giving it a more definite character. The solo was played by Mr. E. Mahr with adequate skill and power. Other features in the programme were the Prelude to "Lohengrin," Schumann's Symphony in B flat, finely played, a contralto scena from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," entrusted to Mdlle. Schneider, an artist with a fine contralto voice and much dramatic feeling; and, lastly, a liberal selection from Sullivan's "Tempest" music, the composer conducting. All these things were well done. At the ninth Concert (on the 27th ult.) the principal feature was to be a selection from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutti."

MR. BERNHARD STAVENHAGEN'S RECITAL.

Notwithstanding the preference shown for bowed over keyed instruments at the present time, when Mr. Gladstone's one happy syllogism, "the marvel of music," becomes as much part and parcel of a girl's education as the pianoforte and the use of the globes used to do in days gone by, the harvest days of pianists have not utterly vanished. To judge by the most recent exemplars of the art—that is to say, by such proficients as Frederick Lamond, Schönberger, and Stavenhagen—there is yet a field of endeavour remaining for accomplished executants whose virtuosity, perhaps, never had a better chance of obtaining recognition than at the present moment. This is as it should be, because probably there were never so large a number of finished and brilliant pianists before the world than there are at present. In days gone by, when an Arabella Goddard or a Charles Hallé electrified musical circles, or, still more recently, when Von Bülow and Rubinstein dazzled London amateurs, a kind of mystery appeared to surround an expert performance on the piano. Now the young generation has shown what is possible to those who possess talent, patience, and industry, and therefore the pianoforte may be accounted to exist in a better position than heretofore. Amongst the apostles of the modern cult, Liszt's best and most favoured pupil—Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen—occupies a prominent position. When the late Abbé visited our shores in April last, he was accompanied by this youthful élève, at whose hands some of the master's compositions were given to the nation with exceedingly good effect. In paying his second visit to England, Mr. Stavenhagen no longer is overshadowed by a larger personality, but appeals to our judgment solely upon his qualities as an artist. Liszt has gone, and it will not be forgotten, even in the face of many eccentricities, that he was a conspicuous figure, and a great power as well, in the world of music. Mr. Stavenhagen is a person of abiding memories. He does not forget his master, and to his blind devotion to his memory must be ascribed the incorporation into the scheme of the recital given at St. James's Hall on the 18th ult., of a sad set of variations on a theme by Bach "Weinen und Klagen" (first time in England), and a series of grand variations on "Suoni la tromba" (MS., for the first time). Granted that these are excellent samples of constructive skill, and that they afford plentiful opportunities to the soloist, it is yet undecided whether the "Crucifixus" from the famous Mass in B minor, or the boisterous duet from "Puritani" cry aloud for variegated treatment. One hearing of the "Suoni la tromba" is, in all conscience, sufficient for the most inordinate musical appetite; and the dismal chromatics of "Weinen und Klagen" engender a sense of discomfort before a dozen bars are heard. Nevertheless, as we have intimated, Mr. Stavenhagen is quite forgiveable for having produced his tutor's hitherto unheard-of works. More satisfactory, in a general sense, was his rendering of Beethoven's lovely Sonata in E minor (Op. 90), and the "Moonlight" (Op. 27); while Schumann's "Papillons" (Op. 2), Chopin's Funeral March (from the Sonata in B minor), Nocturne in F minor, and Polonaise in A flat gave proof of the reciter's command over a comprehensive range of composition, and served still further to bring into prominence the remaining Lisztian excerpts—viz., two studies after Caprices by Paganini—the former announced as being cast in the extraordinary key of E sharp major (!), and the second calling for an immediate encore—and the Nocturne (Chant Polonais) which Liszt himself played in April last at the Royal Academy of Music, when the lads and lasses of that institution pelted not only the old musician, but the pianoforte also, with floral offerings, until the strings became dumb and the executant dumbfounded. Probably in the capricious sentiment which is inherent in Chopin's music, the mood of the young Teutonic exponent was hardly at its happiest; but, taken altogether, Mr. Stavenhagen is an artist with exceptional gifts, producing the widest conceivable range of tones from the instrument without the shade of empiricism. It is not so very long since it was conceived incumbent upon a pianist to qualify himself as a genius by playing heaps of wrong notes: Mr. Stavenhagen prefers the right ones, and his style is a model for all pianists to follow—neither erring on the side of effeminacy nor transgressing in the direction of "blood and thunder."

The audience was not loth to recognise at its full value the effort of the pianist, and applause was freely and heartily bestowed. It will be quite safe, after this experience, to prognosticate a brilliant future for the gifted young performer, whose further endeavours are certain to meet with the approval which they deserve.

MR. SCHÖNBERGER'S RECITAL.

The Pianoforte Recital given by Mr. Schönberger on the afternoon of Friday, the 14th ult., had many features of recommendation, and many specialties to render it an exceptional occurrence. Perhaps the artist was not altogether well advised in selecting a programme which had little of the popular flavour to recommend it; but on the other hand, the number of pieces served to show the virtuosity of the young artist, and to display his abilities as being something out of the common ground. Brahms's Sonata in C major (Op. 1), was, of course, an early example of the now famous master; but it displayed his inventiveness no less than his ingenuity in a most marked degree. In the opening Allegro Mr. Schönberger gave a foretaste of the exquisite delicacy of manipulation which was hereafter to be apparent; in the Andante—which might certainly be called a legend or an ancient air with variations—he gave his auditors an equable taste of his fine execution. Upon the conclusion of the work, Mr. Schönberger was recalled to the platform amid acclamations. Up to this time the praises which had been sounded in favour of the new virtuoso seemed rather uncalled for; but after his preliminary effort the claims of Mr. Schönberger upon public consideration became unmistakable, and it was evident to any one with discriminating perception that Londoners had here been introduced to an executant of the very first rank. In the second section of the Recital, a commencement was made with the Scherzo and Perpetuum mobile, by Haydn—neither acknowledged as far as regards their Opus number, but recognisable to musicians as the movements of the Quartet in D (Op. 64). These two light pieces were played with admirable taste and finish, and, in fact, greater delicacy of touch could not have been expected. A "Minuet," by Mozart, next attracted attention, followed by Mendelssohn's Caprice (Op. 16, No. 2)—sometimes called the "Fairy's Revel"—after which came Raff's Fantasia and Fugue (Op. 91), much more remarkable for the player than the composition. The third division of the programme presented Schumann's Sonata in G minor (Op 22), a work which elicited the remark from a very competent critic that, Schumann in Sonatas seemed like a man in badly fitting clothes. So charming, however, was the soloist's performance, that he obtained a unanimous recall. The last performance on this afternoon by Mr. Schönberger comprised two Etudes of Chopin, three Fugitive Pieces by Jensen—Idyll, Reigen, Intermezzo—and Moszkowski's Tarantelle. No doubt many amateur musicians are acquainted with these last named works, but it remains yet for them to understand with what delicacy and finish they can be rendered, until they hear this young German pianist. His method is absolutely admirable, and should any fault have to be found with his manner, it would simply be to point to his ultra-refinement.

"RUDDYGORE" AT THE SAVOY THEATRE.

Mr. W. S. Gilbert is a wonderful propounder of mysteries, and his ingenuity in this direction seems almost to amount to an occult science. Perhaps never before in the history of the stage has a secret been so jealously guarded as that of the latest of the Gilbert-Sullivan productions. Looking at the outcome of all this secrecy, we may be inclined to cry "Cui bono?" and wonder why so much fictitious importance should have been given to a piece which is by no means startling, though like all of Mr. Gilbert's works it is fanciful, ingenious, and amusing. Some considerations connected with the copyright act may have exercised their influence over the authors; but even this scarcely explains the circulation of rumours—based ostensibly upon official data—calculated not only to mislead the public, but to engender a feeling of disappointment. First of all it was stated that the story was to be founded upon an Egyptian legend—this happened at the period of the Egyptian difficulty. Next it was said that Persia would furnish the scene as well as the legend; then it was affirmed that the theme was to be essentially military. And thus by clever "engineering" an extraordinary amount of interest was developed. The wisdom of this course is open to question. To quote the words of the fourth ghost in the new piece, there is a "fallacy somewhere." But "Ruddygore," although disappointing expectation in the way of any new departure, is every jot as entertaining as any of the works belonging to the same sources; and Sir Arthur Sullivan, by no means fatigued by his exertions over "The Golden Legend," has written some of his freshest and most delightful melodies wherewith to illustrate the book. For such delicacy and refinement we must look back to "Iolanthe," while the grimly grotesque dramatic feeling has scarcely been equalled since the days when "Cox and Box" took the musical world by storm. "Ruddygore; or, the Witch's Curse" is simply a satire upon old English melodramas, and really suggests very little that is new, while throughout it is screamingly funny. The second act, with the vivication of the ancestral portraits of the dead and gone Murgatroyds of Ruddygore, in Cornwall, will remind impartial spectators of "Ages Ago," by Messrs. Gilbert and F. Clay, written for the Gallery of Illustration before the German Reeds had moved their quarters to St. George's Hall. But, apart from the enlivenment of the pictures, there exists no similarity whatever between "Ages Ago" and "Ruddygore." The animus of the plot may be gleaned from the legend sung by Hannah, one of the elderly spinsters inseparable from Gilbertian operas:—

Sir Rupert Murgatroyd
His leisure and his riches
He ruthlessly employed
In persecuting witches.
With fear he'd make them quake—
He'd duck them in his lake—
He'd break their bones
With sticks and stones,
And burn them at the stake!

Chorus. This sport he much enjoyed,
Did Rupert Murgatroyd—
No sense of shame
Or pity came To Rupert Murgatroyd!

Once, on the village green,
A palsied hag he roasted,
And what took place, I ween,
Shook his composure boasted,
For, as the torture grim
Seized on each withered limb,
The writhing dame
'Mid fire and flame
Yelled forth this curse on him:—

"Each lord of Ruddygore,
Despite his best endeavour,
Shall do one crime, or more,
Once, every day, for ever!
This doom he can't defy
However he may try,
For should he stay
His hand, that day
In torture he shall die!"

The prophecy came true:
Each heir who held the title
Had, every day, to do
Some crime of import vital;
Until, with guilt o'erplied,
"I'll sin no more!" he cried,
And on the day
He said that say,
In agony he died!

Chorus. And thus, with sinning cloyed,
Has died each Murgatroyd,
And so shall fall,
Both one and all,
Each coming Murgatroyd!

The last inheritor of the title, Sir Ruthven Murgatroyd, fearful of having to perpetrate perpetual crimes, secludes himself, under the assumed name of Robin Oakapple, in the Cornish village of Rederring. But here Mr. Gilbert may be allowed to offer the explanation in his own words—to which we append the rejoinder of the baronet's ancient servitor, as a specimen of the truest burlesque:—

Adam. My kind master is sad! Dear Sir Ruthven Murgatroyd—
Rob. Hush! As you love me, breathe not that hated name. Twenty years ago, in horror of inheriting that hideous title, and with it the ban that compels all who succeed to the baronetcy to commit at least one crime per day, for life, I fled my home and concealed myself in this innocent village, under the name of Robin Oakapple. My younger brother, Despard, believing me to be dead, succeeded to the title and its attendant curse. For twenty years I have been dead and buried. Don't dig me up now.
Adam. Dear master, it shall be as you wish, for have not I sworn to obey you for ever in all things? Yet, as we are here alone, and as I belong to that particular description of good old man to whom the truth is a refreshing novelty, let me call you by your own right title once more! (Robin assents.) Sir Ruthven Murgatroyd! Baronet! Of Ruddygore! Whew! It's like eight hours at the seaside.

Robin is as modest as he is unassuming. He is really in love with Rose Maybud, but cannot summon up courage enough to declare his passion. As for Rose herself, she is a foundling—"hung in a plated dish-cover to the knocker of the workhouse door, with naught that I could call mine own, save a change of baby linen and a book of etiquette." By that book all her conduct is regulated, and she is accordingly a purist of the severest order. Her propriety and Robin's reticence prevent them arriving at a proper understanding, until Robin's foster-brother, Richard, a man-o'-war's man of the olden type, who is burdened with a heart whose dictates he feels compelled to obey, offers to intercede for him. He is welcomed home in an effusive style by a troop of professional bridesmaids, who are always on duty from ten to four. A capital sea-song is the response to their greeting—speaking perhaps more strongly for Richard's discretion than for his valour. The verses are good enough to quote at length, while it will be readily surmised that the composer has set the lines in a perfectly appropriate manner:—

I shipped, d'ye see, in a Revenue sloop,
And, off Cape Finisterre,
A merchantman we see,
A Frenchman, going free,
So we made for the bold Mounseer,
D'ye see?
So we made for the bold Mounseer.
But she proved to be a Frigate—and she up with her ports,
And fires with a thirty-two!
It come uncommon near,
But we answered with a cheer,
Which paralysed the Parly-voo,
D'ye see?
Which paralysed the Parly-voo!

Then our Captain he up and he says, says he,
"That chap we need not fear,—
We can take her, if we like,
She is sartin for to strike,
For she's only a darned Mounseer,
D'ye see?
She's only a darned Mounseer!
But to fight a French fal-lal—it's like hittin' of a gal—
It's a lubberly thing for to do;
For we, with all our faults,
Why we're sturdy British salts,
While she's only a Parley-voo,
D'ye see?
A miserable Parley-voo!"

So we up with our helm, and we scuds before the breeze
As we gives a compassionating cheer;
Froggee answers with a shout
As he sees us go about,
Which was grateful of the poor Mounseer,
D'ye see?
Which was grateful of the poor Mounseer!
And I'll wager in their joy they kissed each other's cheek
(Which is what them furriners do),
And they blessed their lucky stars
We were hardy British tars
Who had pity on a poor Parley-voo,
D'ye see?
Who had pity on a poor Parley-voo!

Robin, himself devoid of assurance, deputes his foster-brother to propose for the hand of Rose, and Richard's heart, "it up and it says" that he ought to make love to her on his own account. How his proposal is received may be gleaned from the following rejoinder:—

Rose (aside). Now, how should a maiden deal with such an one? (Consults book.) "Keep no one in unnecessary suspense." (Aloud.) Behold, I will not keep you in unnecessary suspense. (Refers to book.) "In accepting an offer of marriage, do so with apparent hesitation." (Aloud.) I take you, but with a certain show of reluctance. (Refers to book) "Avoid any appearance of eagerness." (Aloud.) Though you will bear in mind that I am far from anxious to do so. (Refers to book.) "A little show of emotion will not be misplaced!" (Aloud.) Pardon this tear! (Wipes her eye.)

The bridesmaids have now a prospective job on hand, and in one of Sir Arthur Sullivan's most tuneful measures, "Hail the bridegroom! hail the bride!" they give vent to their feelings. But Robin is by no means delighted to hear that Richard has pleaded for himself, and not for his foster-brother. Nevertheless, he supports Dick's claim; albeit it is obvious that Rose's etiquette and not her affection has prompted her to unite herself to the mariner. Then enter upon the scene a number of "Bucks and Blades" attired in the most gorgeous specimens of military uniform which the commencement of the nineteenth century ever witnessed. They sing a capital chorus, "When thoroughly tired of being admired by ladies of gentle degree, degree," to which an equally melodious response is made by the bridesmaids. The next person to appear upon the stage is Robin's younger brother, Sir Despard Murgatroyd. An admirable song for Sir Despard, with interjectional choral refrains, "Oh, why am I moody and sad," emphasizes his entrance. He is, to quote an almost forgotten work of Mr. Gilbert's, "a Saint by choice, a Devil by compulsion," and commits his diurnal crime early in the morning in order that he may have a long day for atonement. From Richard, Despard hears of the existence of the brother whom he had thought dead, and in some wonderfully humorous dialogue the scene is conducted to a duet (Despard and Richard), "You understand." The Bucks and professional bridesmaids re-appear and sing a charming chorus; when, to succeed this, the chief characters sing a madrigal, supported by the members of the choir. Sir Arthur Sullivan is always happy when reproducing the sentiment of early English music, and here we have an example which will not only gratify the profanum vulgus, but discriminating musicians. After a gavotte—conceived and executed in the same artistic spirit as the madrigal—Sir Despard enters to "claim young Robin as my elder brother." The cat being thus let out of the bag, Rose shows her preference for Sir Despard, who is also claimed by Mad Margaret, the village maiden he had deceived when he was suffering under the conditions of the imprecation, and now—

Folly regretting
Is bent in forgetting
His bad baronetting,
And means to repent

Robin, or Sir Ruthven, properly so-called, swoons away under the infliction which he had defeated for so many years, and with this episode the first of the two acts into which Mr. Gilbert, following a time-honoured precedent, has cast the work, comes to a close. The music, perhaps, takes prominence here over the subject, and the curtain is brought down upon a thoroughly exhilarating finale.

The idyllic simplicity of the first act has well-nigh disappeared when the curtain rises again. Now we are introduced to the picture-gallery in Ruddygore Castle, where the walls are covered with full length portraits of the Baronets of Ruddygore, dating from the time of James I. The first picture is that of Sir Rupert, alluded to in the legend, and the last the "counterfeit presentment" of the last leading member of the family, Sir Roderic. The characters previously known as Robin and Adam now appear on the scene as Sir Ruthven—"wearing the haggard aspect of a guilty roué"—and Adam Goodheart, having changed his name to Gideon Crawle, with manners to match. A number occurs here which is very amusing indeed. Adam has taken more kindly to his new honours than his master, and already has grasped the melodramatic expression of "Ha, ha!" which poor Robin cannot imitate at all. He is even compelled to ask Adam "as his confidential adviser" to suggest his daily crime, but refuses to poison the beer which is to be offered to Richard and Rose. "No; not that," says the new Sir Ruthven, "I know I'm a bad Bart., but I'm not as bad a Bart. as all that." Instead, the whilom Robin offers to lure Richard with cunning wile, and curdle the marrow in his bones by making hideous faces at him. In answer to the query "How say you, Gideon, is not the scheme well planned?" the aged servitor replies, "It would be simply rude—nothing more." For the convenience of Richard and Rose and the ubiquitous bridesmaids, Adam and Robin retire, and the incomers have a very pretty duet, with choral refrain, "Happily coupled are we." At this juncture Mr. Gilbert steps in with one of his humoristic strokes. Says Robin, "So ho, pretty one—in my power at last, eh?" and Richard answers, "Hold, we are prepared for this" (producing a Union Jack). "Here is a flag that none dare defy," and all that Robin can reply is, "Foiled—and by a Union Jack! But a time will come—." The chief situation of the act is in the coming to life of the family portraits—to an appropriate musical setting. Throughout all this supernatural episode Sir Arthur Sullivan shows a wonderful command of lyrical expression, and the song for Sir Roderic, "When the night wind howls," is a piece of finished art. Robin's confession of crimes by no means reaches the height of his ancestor's expectations. He professes that he has been a bad Baronet for only a week, but excuses himself for the commission of his Monday crime by the meagre subterfuge that it was a Bank holiday. On Tuesday he made a false income-tax return, but this is met with the expostulation that everybody does it, and it was expected of him; on Wednesday he forged his own will; on Thursday shot a fox (unanimously passed as a crime of the first order); forged Gideon Crawle's cheque on Friday—objected to because Crawle had no banker—and wound up by disinheriting his unborn son. He explains that the disinheritance is made in advance to save time, but the pictures are not satisfied and will not be pacified under the forcible abduction of a lady—the ghosts are not particular what lady. Unless Robin consents to this proceeding he will perish in inconceivable agonies, a foretaste of which is administered him by way of warning. Of course Robin is therefore ready to do all that is demanded of him, and magnanimously pardons the exorbitant ghosts. Of Robin's patter song, occurring next in the score, there is no need to enter into particulars; but the appearance of Sir Despard and Mad Margaret as Sunday-school teachers revives the waning humorous interest. On offering to relapse into one of her mad fits, Margaret implores her "master" to recall her to her senses with a word that teems with hidden meaning—Basingstoke being the chosen expression. Despard has in his time been a great sinner, but his excuse is, that he has been acting as Robin's representative, and so is practically blameless. Such an accumulation of horrors is more than the last bad baronet can stand, so he calls for his uncle Roderic to succour him, and the latter comes up a trap after a good deal of persuasion. Old Hannah and Roderic turn out to have been sweethearts, and then, in a very curious way, the play ends—or it might be said to collapse. It is brought about that a baronet of Ruddygore can only die through refusing to commit his daily crime, but the refusal to commit that crime is equivalent to suicide. None of the ancestors, therefore, ought to have died at all, and they become reanimated, greatly to the satisfaction of the band of professional bridesmaids. Rose pairs off with Robin, and so the play reaches its termination.

In speaking of the music which Sir Arthur Sullivan has wedded to the theme, we are compelled to dwell in generalities rather than in particulars. Always pretty and frequently fascinating, "Ruddygore" will probably stand forth as one of the most brilliant examples which the associated art of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan has brought into existence. The chorus of "Bucks and Blades" is a decided surprise, and it will not be long before it goes the round of organ-grinding popularity. Miss Leonora Braham is in all ways excellent as Rose Maybud, her assumption of prim Quakerish manners being very diverting; she also brings to her task the finish and culture of an accomplished musician; Miss Jessie Bond as Mad Margaret is genuinely grotesque; and Miss Rosina Brandram is the best conceivable exponent of Dame Hannah. Mr. George Grossmith, in the character of Robin, has a part rather out of his usual line—but which, however, he plays with his customary tact and ability; Mr. Durward Lely shows himself as Richard not only to be a capital vocalist, but a skilful dancer—his hornpipe in the first act being one of the features of the piece; Mr. Rudolf Lewis is a fully competent Adam; and Mr. Rutland Barrington has sufficient opportunity for his display as a comedian as Sir Despard. Mention ought to be made of the able manner in which "Ruddygore" is placed upon the stage—both scenery and costumes being in the best taste conceivable. Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted the first performance, on Saturday, the 22nd ult., and, together with the author, received a hearty recall at the end.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

Liverpool's Christmastide was celebrated by the usual series of "Messiah" performances, some of which deserve special reference. The first took place on December 22, in St. George's Hall, under the Cambrian Choral Society's auspices, with Miss Clara Perry, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Ben Davies, and Signor Foli as principals; Mr. W. T. Best, organist; and Mr. D. O. Parry as Conductor. This was followed on December 24 by another rendering, with small band and purely local talent, in the Association Hall, Mount Pleasant; and on the succeeding night the Philharmonic Choral Society gave its annual performance of Handel's great work in St. George's Hall, under the direction of Mr. Randegger. The choruses were characterised by the usual vigour and intelligence, and the capable quartet of principals consisted of Miss Clara Samuell, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Lucas Williams. Mr. Best again presided at the grand organ with his accustomed ability.

The last Concert of the Philharmonic Society, in the old year, took place on December 21, and derived its chief interest from the variety of the orchestral selections, which included Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, and the following three Overtures: Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," Schumann's "Manfred," and Weber's "Ruler of the Spirits." Excerpts from Gluck's "Orpheus" and Berlioz's "Childhood of Christ" were also included in the programme, and served to introduce the chorus; and a further item, which proved particularly interesting and enjoyable, was a Serenade for strings in C, by Herr Fuchs, a composer whose name is rapidly acquiring deserved prominence. Madame Patey was the vocalist of the evening, and, in the continued absence of Mr. Chas. Hallé, Mr. Hecht conducted.

This Society's performance of "Elijah" took place at the Philharmonic Hall on the 11th ult. The principals were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Santley. Mr. Santley's interpretation of the Prophet's music has been heard so many times as to scarcely call for comment, his best effort on this occasion being in the Aria "Is not His word like a fire?" Mr. Piercy sang with judgment and taste, and in "Then shall the righteous" roused the enthusiasm of the audience. Both ladies sustained their parts with evident satisfaction. The choir, although occasionally deficient in attack, was careful and tasteful in the rendering of the stirring massive numbers, and the band was equally efficient. The performance was under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Hallé.

The fifth Concert of the present Hallé series occurred on the 4th ult., and was the vehicle for a very hearty return welcome to the talented impresario of these Concerts, whose lengthened illness had been a source of general concern in musical circles. It was, therefore, gratifying to find that Mr. Halié's accustomed vigour and energy had not suffered in any way in the interval. The orchestral music at this Concert opened with Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," which always raises regrets that the opera with which it is connected is the only representative afforded to us of Beethoven's lyric genius. The Symphony was a comparative novelty to Liverpool, being Brahms's No. 4, in E minor, and the palpable effect which its rendering left upon the minds of the audience, was that it would be premature to pronounce a definite opinion without a further hearing. The work is classical and interesting, but whilst capable of minute analysis, does not contain those dashes of fire and inspiration which we naturally look for in Brahms's productions, It, however, does not lack variety, as it abounds in rhythmic changes, modulations, and variations of theme, and the third movement, Allegro giocoso, in the Rondo form instead of the conventional Scherzo, is an interesting and effective innovation. Saint-Säens's Ballet Music from "Henry VIII." was also a welcome item in the programme, and was rendered crisply and pleasingly by the band. Madame Norman-Néruda appeared, according to announcement, for the last time in Liverpool this season, and her delightful rendering of Vieuxtemps's difficult Concerto, No. 2, in F sharp minor, and Beethoven's popular Romanza in G, met with the usual enthusiastic reception. Miss Agnes Jansen, a Swedish artist of comparatively recent note, made a distinctly favourable impression by her chaste and delicate singing of Massenet's "Le Crépuscule" and a set of her native songs, the last of which earned a decided encore.

The Carl Rosa Opera season, which commenced on the 3rd ult., has already demonstrated two facts—first, that there is no doubt as to Liverpool having established itself as the home of English Opera, and second, that the individual and collective excellence of Mr. Rosa's organisation increases with each returning visit. This completeness in every detail inspires the public with confidence in the success of whatever work may be put forward for representation; and, as Mr. Rosa's wide experience has taught him, is the sure road to financial prosperity. It is a further gratifying sign of the tendency of musical thought and inclination that the best operas have been the most attractive—Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and his ever popular "Marriage of Figaro" have drawn full houses, and, in their representation, Mesdames Georgina Burns, Julia Gaylord, and Blanche Cole, and Mr. Leslie Crotty, Mr. Max Eugene, and Mr. Barton McGuckin have equally distinguished themselves. Mr. James Sauvage also, who is making rapid progress in the profession, gave a faithful impersonation of Don Juan, well in keeping with old traditions. In "Ruy Blas," Mr. Valentine Smith sang and acted the rôle of the unfortunate hero with spirit and intention.

The event, however, so far as the season has gone, has been the reproduction, after a long lapse of time, of Wagner's exacting Opera "Lohengrin," and the masterful manner in which the difficulties surrounding the representation of the work have been overcome has met with marked recognition. "Lohengrin" is, moreover, an opera which cannot be digested at a single hearing, and this fact, coupled with the pronounced success which it has achieved, will doubtless tend to its frequent repetition. As regards the representation, the first honours are certainly due to the American tenor, Mr. Edward Scovel. His voice is not powerful, but extremely penetrating and sympathetic, with a remarkably clear enunciation, and in his assumption of the title-rôle it would be a misnomer to allude to his acting, for his identity was lost in the complete fervour with which he threw himself into the chequered mission of the Knight ot the Holy Grail. Rarely has a finer conception of the character been seen on the operatic stage. Madame Marie Roze was the Elsa, and evidenced that the part had been carefully studied. Her acting throughout was marked by considerable depth and delicacy, and her singing was in keeping. Of the other characters, Miss Jenny Dickerson, in the trying rôle of Ortrud, Mr. Henry Pope as the King, and Mr. Max Eugene as Telramund were thoroughly efficient, and the well rehearsed band and chorus, and the excellent stage accessories completed a memorable performance. Mr. Lawson, in the regrettable absence of Mr. Goossens, through indisposition, conducted with ability.

Other notable events of this opera season have been the appearance, for the first time, of Madame Marie Roze in the character of Margaret in Gounod's "Faust," and the successful production of Mr. F. Corder's opera "Nordisa," a detailed notice of which will be found in another column.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

The annual performance of the "Faust" of Berlioz, on the last Thursday in December, was rendered more remarkable by the re-appearance of Mr. Hallé, who conducted with very slight semblance of weakness or remaining indisposition, and was received with all the favour and enthusiasm due to such an experienced and indefatigable artist. The interpretation of the work—which Mr. Hallé has perseveringly established among us—was perhaps not quite so brilliant as usual; or it may be that, the novelty having worn off, the sensational and somewhat meretricious character of much of the music is now more prominent. Miss Mary Davies and Mr. Lloyd were constant to their original parts, and Mr. Santley once more appeared as Mephistopheles. At the first Concert in the new year, Brahms's Symphony in E minor was the novelty—commanding respect for the earnestness and skill of its composer rather than giving any positive delight. Doubtless repeated hearings and study would reveal beauties of thought and of construction not at first apparent; but, so far, I must estimate Brahms's fourth symphonic effort rather as a laboriously compiled work than as a fresh and spontaneous poem. Madame Néruda, not for the first time here, played Beethoven's Violin Concerto, rendering the larghetto with inimitable grace and tenderness, and the other movements with irreproachable delicacy of intonation and beauty of tone. On the 13th ult. Mr. Bernhard Stavenhagen appeared as an exponent of the pianoforte writings of his celebrated master, Liszt, playing the Concerto, No. 2, in A, and a Hungarian Rhapsody, besides the Nocturne in F minor, and the Polonaise in A flat of Chopin. Taken as a whole, Mr. Stavenhagen's performance exhibited very great promise. As an executant he has few difficulties remaining yet unconquered. His scale passages are equal, clear, rapid, and infinitely shaded in variety and force of tone, and his octave playing is as brilliant as may be imagined. Mdlle. Trebelli is rapidly developing force and richness of voice adequate for the display of the excellence of the method under which she has been so carefully trained. Amid the more modern—and, perhaps, extravagant—items of a long programme, Mozart's G minor Symphony afforded a welcome relief, and an opportunity for calm enjoyment to those so old-fashioned as to delight in sweet sounds and clear ideas, without the semi-torture of ever endeavouring to fathom some mysterious depths of hidden meaning. Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride" and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" were contrasted at the thirteenth Concert of Mr. Hallé's series on the 20th ult., the vocalists being Miss Annie Marriott, who sang with great acceptance and considerable dramatic power, though with some lack of finish, Miss Bertenshaw, who displayed a voice of adequate strength and, in its middle range, of charming quality, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills.

Mr. de Jong, in addition to a performance of "Judas Maccabæus" on the 15th ult., which left much to be desired, has given several Concerts of his usual type, and Mr. Ferneley is persevering in his efforts to establish his orchestral essays in public favour.

At the Concert Hall, Mr. Hallé has resumed his Recitals, and, at the closing Concert of 1886, Mr. Hecht played with great clearness and with his customary incisiveness of style, Mozart's Concerto (No. 6), in E flat, Madame Albani being the vocalist.

Messrs. Risegari, Speelman, Bernhardt, and Vieuxtemps (our admirable Manchester quartet party) recommenced work on the 8th ult., at the Memorial Hall, with Dvorák's Op. 61 in C. Unfortunately, Signor Risegari became so indisposed as to be unable to take part in the concluding work, Mozart's Quartet in F, but his part was ably undertaken by Mr. Speelman, Herr Jacoby, who chanced to be in the room, taking the second violin.

Miss Amina Goodwin attracted her friends to the Concert Hall on the 19th ult., and displayed continued advance in executive ability, and some increase in power of expression. Miss Goodwin's Pianoforte Recitals, as well as the chamber music of the Risegari party, ought to be included in the season's programme of the Gentlemen's Concerts. The fostering of all such really capable local efforts (and not competition in orchestral performances) comes within the true mission of that institution.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

Since the Christmas performance of "The Messiah" by the members of the local Festival Choral Society, which took place at too late a date for detailed reference last month, there has been little in the shape of music here that would interest the readers of The Musical Times. The theatres, with one exception, have been given up to pantomime, and the Town Hall to balls, and though a sort of Musical Parliament was held here in the early part of the month by the members of the National Society of Professional Musicians, it will be seen from the report elsewhere that the proceedings, like those of another Parliament, were more prolific in words than in deeds, and that the results, from a musical point of view, were hardly in proportion to the means. Nevertheless, the Congress was distinguished by two semi-public musical performances of considerable interest, the first selected from the unpublished works of the members of the Association, and the second from works which had passed the ordeal of publication; but these Concerts may be more fittingly noticed in connection with the conference.

The one theatre to which incidental reference has been made as not being under the sway of pantomime, is a new, or rather newly converted, building specially intended for operetta, which opened shortly after Christmas with a short season of English opera, by the members of the Turner Company. Among the principal members of the company were Miss Constance Bellamy, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Arthur Rousbey, and Mr. J. W. Turner. There was a fairly good band and chorus, but, owing to accidental circumstances, the scenic accessories were of a very primitive and inadequate order. "Maritana," "Il Trovatore," and "The Bohemian Girl" appeared to be the favourite works.

Nothing daunted by the chilling reception accorded to them here in December, Mr. Mapleson's Italian Opera Company gave another Concert in the Town Hall, on the 21st ult., when the attendance, though apparently short of what was needed for a financial success, was much more satisfactory than on the previous occasion. The programme was again of a miscellaneous character, composed chiefly of ballad and operatic selections, but a special feature was introduced in the second part, which was devoted to a recital in full costume of the garden scene from Gounod's "Faust." Mdlle. Lilian Nordica, as Margherita, more than confirmed the favourable impression produced by her stage performance of the part, especially delighting the audience by her brilliant and spirited execution of the "Jewel Song." Mdlle. Hastreiter was unfortunately absent, and Siebel's "Flower Song" had consequently to be omitted. Signor Runcio was certainly not wanting in vigour or power as Faust, and the Mephistopheles of Signor Vetta was particularly effective in the duets with Dame Martha (Madame Lablache) and the concerted pieces. In the first part of the Concert the chief honours fell to Mdlle. Marie Engle, whose execution of Proch's Air and Variations was distinguished by great neatness and refinement; Mdlle. Nordica, who electrified the audience by her bravura singing in "Gli angui d'inferno"; Mdlle. Louisa Dotti repeated her success of the previous month in Handel's "Angels ever bright and fair," and Signor Runcio was especially effective in Flotow's "M'apari un di." The only instrumental performance was a violin solo, contributed by M. Jaquinot, who also rendered valuable assistance in the second part in accompanying the "Faust" selection.

At Dr. Heap's second Chamber Concert, which took place at the Masonic Hall, on the 28th, the programme comprised Ebenezer Prout's Pianoforte Quartet (Op. 18), Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in G (Op. 31), Trio in F (Op. 42), Gade; Chaconne, violin solo (Bach), and String Quartet in G (Op. 161), Schubert. The artists were Messrs. Ludwig Straus, Speelmann, Bernhardt, Vieuxtemps, and Dr. Heap.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company is announced to give a three weeks' season here, commencing on the 14th inst.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

The weather has been exceedingly unfavourable for musical gatherings during the past month, and although Concerts have been as attractive as ever, there does not appear such keen anxiety on the part of the public to attend them as was shown prior to the holidays. In one or two instances the audiences have been wretchedly thin, and not a few societies and entrepreneurs will have cause for dissatisfaction. One notable example of failure which occurs to me was the admirable Concert given the other evening in St. George's Hall, Bradford, by members of Her Majesty's Opera Company, under the auspices of Mr. J. H. Mapleson, when, notwithstanding a capital programme and unexceptional singing, there was an audience of barely 100 people. On the other hand, there have been occasions—though few—when the contrary state of things has prevailed, as, for instance, when, only a few nights prior to the disastrous event referred to, the same building was crammed from floor to ceiling, and hundreds were turned away, on the occasion of a Concert given by a detachment of the Grenadier Guards' band, with the aid of two local volunteer bands, a wretched little string band, and a couple of pipers from a Highland regiment. The affair created a sensation, and the managers profited accordingly, but, from an artistic point of view, the Concert was absolutely valueless.

The leading serial Concerts do not, of course, suffer from the fickle-mindedness of the musical public, though there are no great things to be said of the attendances during the month. The programme of the fourth Bradford Subscription Concert was enticing, and appealed to every variety of taste, although English composers were excluded from the selection. Dvorák's Grand Symphony in D major awakened fresh interest in the work of the Bohemian master, who, if he proceeds upon the old lines of movement and form, has in this, as in most other cases, a good deal to say that is characteristically new and original. The distribution of work among the instruments, the ingenious use of themes, the attractive melody of the Finale, and, above all, the firmness and consistency of the entire work were features which contributed with many other details to an effective manifestation of skill. The audience were never more powerfully moved during the evening than by the performance of this item. But there were many other novelties. Wagner was represented by the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," and the Walkürenritt from "Der Walküre," two widely-contrasting excerpts, which made a deep impression. The powerful embodiment of the visionary sword-maidens was rendered with spirit, and the weird reality of the Walkürenritt music generally was reproduced with striking effect. The Overture to "Les Francs Juges," and the ballet music from Saint-Saëns's "Henry VIII." were brilliantly rendered, as was also the more familiar Overture to "Egmont," which was played as an Overture to the Concert. The vocalist was Mdlle. Schneider, who found congenial employment for her voice in the selections which she made—namely, the Romance from "Rosamunde," songs by Tschaikowski and Rubinstein, Hiller's "Gebet," and Mozart's "Lullaby." Her voice, a firm contralto, was used with much expression and fervour. Mr. Midgley was the accompanist. It was an unqualified pleasure to find Mr. Hallé once more at his old place after a severe illness.

The sixth of Mr. W. B. Sewell's series of Saturday Popular Concerts again attracted only a moderate audience on the 7th ult., though there was manifestly every element of interest to musical amateurs. As for technical ability, Mr. Sewell's orchestra has well nigh disarmed criticism, but it has not yet succeeded in attracting musical flâneurs, who, after all, constitute an element which must be reckoned with in musical enterprise. The Overture to "Tannhäuser," the Introduction to "Lohengrin," and the Prelude to the third act of the same opera, with the Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," constituted the efforts of the orchestra on this occasion. A good deal of interest attached to the appearance of Mdlle. Pauline Ellice, a young pianist of the age of eleven. Mdlle. Ellice, at any rate, showed the quality of courage in abundance, and indeed gave a satisfactory rendering of Mendelssohn's Capriccio, with orchestral accompaniment, and of two of Liszt's compositions, one of which was the arrangement of the quartet from "Rigoletto." In the latter she exhibited a commendable quality of refinement and expression, and in everything she attempted was equal to technical requirements. Mendelssohn's "Sons of Art," with several unaccompanied glees, were rendered by a male chorus of sixty voices, selected from several local societies. Mdme. Mudie Bolingbroke was the solo vocalist, and sang with much ability. The choral numbers were conducted by Mr. B. Watson. At Mr. Sewell's seventh Concert, on the 22nd ult., the band gave a creditable performance of the "Leonora" Overture (No. 3), and Mr. Midgley played the same composer's Concerto in C minor. Miss Phillipine Siedle was the vocalist.

Mr. Rawlinson Ford had, as usual, several capital things to offer at the third of his present series of Popular Concerts, held in the Leeds Coliseum on the 5th ult., and it was a matter of regret that the weather militated seriously against the attendance. Apart from other items of the programme, Brahms's Trio in B major absorbed the close attention of amateurs, and deepened their admiration for the composer's genius. The Trio, a dexterously woven and wonderfully compact piece of work, was played with spirit and gracefulness, and in some parts with reckless freedom of so clever a kind as almost to add to the merit of the material itself. This was especially the case in the final Allegro in which the pace was such as to fairly force the audience into the expression of approval. Mr. Franz Rummel had a warm reception as solo pianist. His chief effort was the performance of Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata, the vigorous emotion of which was brought out in bold and incisive measure. The delicacy and soft graces of the pianist's art were also well displayed in a selection from Chopin. Miss Shinner drew upon Sarasate for a couple of violin solos, and in response to an encore she added a Mazurka by Wieniawski. Mr. Charles Ould, the only other instrumentalist of the evening, played a Romance and Tarantella by Goltermann. Among other instrumental items was Schubert's Rondeau in B minor, excellently played by Miss Shinner and Mr. Rummel. Miss Eleanor Rees, as vocalist, gave much satisfaction in the singing of compositions by Donizetti, Balfe, and Goring Thomas. The accompanist was Mr. Alfred Broughton. A similar programme was carried out in connection with the Huddersfield Subscription Concert on the 4th ult. The artists were Miss Anna Lang (violin), Mr. Rummel, and Mr. Ould; and the vocalist Miss Eleanor Rees, whose songs were accompanied by Mr. John North.

Mr. Alfred Christensen gave a Matinée Concert at the Leeds Conservatoire of Music on the 8th ult., and was assisted by Messrs. Eckener and Giessing. Among the works selected for performance were Beethoven's Trio in B flat major (Op. 11) and Balfe's Trio in A major. The Matinée was fairly well attended, and the performances gave much satisfaction.

Mr. Myles Birket Foster, whose compositions for children's voices have earned a vast amount of appreciation in this district, has added another to the long list of his works in the shape of a Cantata on the subject of "Beauty and the Beast." The Cantata was produced for the first time on the 15th ult., by children of the Keighley Congregational Schools, under the conductorship of Mr. Craven Laycock. The solo work is distributed among five voices, and the choruses are simple and pleasing. One excellent feature of the work is an orchestral interlude descriptive of a shipwreck. The music is full of spirit, and excellently suited to the words, which are graceful. The performance was an unqualified success.

From a large number of miscellaneous Concerts which have been given during the month, the Monday Popular Concerts of Messrs. Hopkinson Brothers, of Leeds, may be selected for mention. The work done on each occasion has been of an excellent description, and should command the attention of musicians as well as those who merely desire to be entertained. Mr. Mapleson's company of operatic artists appeared at the Concerts held on the 3rd and the 17th ult. The vocalists were Madame Clara Samuell, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Fred. Gordon.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

Long experience teaches Bristolians to look for little in the way of public music during the Christmas holidays, and we have now learnt to accept with resignation the occupation of our public halls by panoramas, minstrels, or other like entertainments for a period of at least six weeks. Nevertheless, there is always one most interesting musical event to look forward to early in January—namely, the annual Ladies' Night, given by the Bristol Madrigal Society. This delightful Concert took place on the 13th ult., before the invariable packed audience, and formed the fifty-first annual performance of the Society. Generally there are some new compositions of interest brought forward at these meetings, and this year was no exception to the rule. There were three novelties, two of which were expressly written for this Concert, one being a pleasing composition by Mr. Samuel Reay, entitled "Fairest daughter of the day." It is written for seven voices, and was exceedingly well sung, and Mr. Reay, who was present, was loudly called for at the conclusion. The other was a setting of Campbell's ballad "Lord Ullin's Daughter," by Dr. Mann, of Cambridge, who also was present, and who was much gratified by the fine rendering his work received. It is a very forcible and dramatic composition, and lost none of its impressiveness in the hands of the Madrigalians. Walmisley's "See, O see" was the third item heard for the first time on this occasion. It was dedicated to the Society in 1842, but, by some accident, was lost, and only recently discovered by a local amateur, who presented it to the Society. It seemed to bid fair to become popular, and will, doubtless, receive a second hearing ere long. Dr. Stainer's Jubilee Madrigal, "The Triumph of Victoria," was heard for the first time in Bristol, and was very finely rendered. The scholarship of the work is undoubted, and reflects honour on the writer, whom we hoped to have seen present with us on this evening, but he was prevented attending through indisposition, which was much regretted by the singers. The remainder of the programme consisted chiefly of old favourites, which were given with the accustomed fire and effect, some of the pianissimo passages being simply delicious. If one may find a fault with an otherwise beautiful performance it would be that the boys were not always perfectly in tune, which failing was noticeable chiefly towards the latter part of the evening. We remember the same fault last year, and that we attributed it to the fatigue entailed by the number of encores given. This year, however, the Conductor was wisely far more sparing in acceding to the demands of the audience, so that we are more at a loss to account for this defect. But, as a whole, the performance fully sustained the high reputation of the Society, and redounded greatly to the credit of the efficient and popular Conductor, Mr. D. W. Rootham. We append the programme: Part I.—"God save the Queen"; "Sing we, and chant it," Morley; "Up, up ye dames," W. Macfarren; "Ladye, when I behold," Wilbye; "See! see, O see," Walmisley; "In going to my lonely bed," Edwards; "Fairest daughter of the day," Reay; "As Vesta was," Weelkes; "Behold the wood," Mendelssohn; "My bonny lass," Morley; "The Triumph of Victoria," Stainer. Part II.—"Stay, Corydon, thou swain," Wilbye; "In dulci jubilo," Pearsall; "When April deck'd," Marenzio; "Great God of Love," Pearsall; "Verdant Spring," Mendelssohn; "Lord Ullin's Daughter," Dr. Mann; "Caput apri defero," Pearsall; "Soldiers, brave and gallant be," Gastoldi; "The Waits," Saville.

We have a great deal to look forward to during the present month of musical interest, after which we must prepare for the usual abstinence of the Lenten season. At the end of December there were some Concerts which we would gladly have noticed more in detail, had space allowed it, but we should, perhaps, specify the exceedingly creditable performance of Handel's "Messiah," by the Clifton Philharmonic Society, given in the Victoria Rooms, on December 27. The choir is at present in its youth, but bids fair to add considerably to the musical credit of our city. The solos were entrusted to Miss Maud Hare, Mdme. Marian McKenzie, Mr. Percy Palmer, and Mr. Montague Worlock, who acquitted themselves very successfully. The Organist, Mr. Cedric Bucknall, Mus. Bac., deserves high praise for his skilful accompaniment, and Mr. Walter Kidner rendered good service as Conductor.

The ambitious effort of the Bath Philharmonic Society in presenting Gounod's "Redemption," on December 23, was justified by a very satisfactory result, which evidenced very painstaking rehearsals and earnest work on the part of both Conductor and chorus. This Society is also young, but is rapidly advancing in efficiency, and shows progress at each Concert.

A grand Amateur Concert was given by Mr. Augustus Aylward, at Salisbury, on December 29, in aid of the fund for providing free entertainments for the working classes. The Viscountess Folkestone was announced to sing, but was prevented from journeying from Folkestone by the severe weather. Miss Amy Aylward kindly sang instead. The other vocalists were the Rev. and Mrs. L. L. Howard, Mrs. H. Coates, and the Rev. W. H. Carpenter, all of whom were most successful in their respective songs. Miss Amy Aylward received a unanimous encore for Arditi's "L'Ardita" valse, accompanied by the orchestra. Mr. F. Bartlett (violn), Mr. Vivian (oboe), and Mr. A. Aylward (contra-bass), each received encores for their respective solos, and the orchestra, numbering upwards of thirty performers, played most effectively Prout's March from "Alfred," Overtures to "Zauberflöte" and "Si j'étais Roi," the Andante from the Italian Symphony, Gounod's "Saltarello," &c. Mr. Augustus Aylward conducted, and the Concert was a great success, a substantial sum being realised for the fund. The hall was crowded.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

The third Concert of the Choral Union took place on December 20, when Cherubini's Overture "Lodoïska," Serenade in C for strings, Beethoven's Symphony, No. 2, in D, and selections from Massenet's Suite "Scènes pittoresques" formed the orchestral numbers. Liszt's Concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 1, in E flat, served to introduce Mr. Stavenhagen to an Edinburgh audience. He achieved a brilliant success in this work, and as solos he played a Nocturne and the A flat Polonaise of Chopin, followed by Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 13, as an encore.

The fourth Orchestral Concert, under the auspices of the Choral Union, was given on the 10th ult. The programme consisted of Haydn's Symphony in C, Mendelssohn's Concert Overture "Calm sea and prosperous voyage," selections from Godard's "Scènes poetiques," and Schumann's Concerto for piano and orchestra. Miss Fanny Davies, the pianist on this occasion, distinguished herself particularly by the very elegant rendering of her solos, selected from Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Scarlatti, and, in response to a very hearty recall, she played a Valse by Rubinstein. Mr. Albert Bach contributed three songs—a Romanza from Donizetti's "Don Pasquale," Schumann's "Wanderlied," and Aria from Verdi—in his usual efficient style.

The St. Andrew's Amateur Orchestral Society gave a Concert in the Literary Institute, on the evening of the 12th ult. The chief orchestral numbers of the programme were the "Rakoczy" March, Haydn's Military Symphony, and a Choral, "Victoria," composed by Sir Herbert Oakeley, the Professor of Music, on the occasion of Her Majesty's visit to Edinburgh. Amateur vocalists and a pianist completed the Concert. Mr. Lingard conducted.

Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed on the 17th ult. by the Choral Union. The vocalists who sustained the leading parts were Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Marion Burton, and Messrs. Piercy and Brereton, the less important numbers being sung by local vocalists. Mr. Collinson conducted.

Under the auspices of the Greyfriars Literary Association, an evening Concert was given on the 19th ult., in the Masonic Hall, in which Miss Annie Grey, Mr. H. Seligmann (from Glasgow), Mr. Connell Wood, vocalists; Mr. Carl Hamilton and Mr. J. Peter, instrumentalists, took part. The programme was a varied one, and received full justice at the hands of these artists.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND WEST OF SCOTLAND.

To complete my record of musical doings in this district in December, I have to note the following Concerts. The Choir of Queen's Park Established Church gave a performance of Gaul's Cantata "Ruth," on the 22nd of that month, under the direction of Mr. S. Fraser, Organist of the Church; the Choir of Erskine United Presbyterian Church, of which Mr. T. Ewing is the Conductor, sang Jackson's Cantata "The Year," on the same evening; and the Mount Vernon Musical Association, which is under the honorary charge of Mr. R. Riddel, rendered the same work on the Friday following.

On Christmas Eve a performance was given of Handel's "Messiah," by the Festival Choir of the Glasgow Foundry Boys' Religious Society, in St. Andrew's Hall, in presence of a large audience. The chorus numbered 300 voices, and though the tone was not strong, the choristers being all young, it was yet very agreeable. The execution could hardly have been surpassed by maturer choirs — time, phrasing, and expression being alike excellent. There was a fairly efficient amateur orchestra, aided by some professionals from the Choral Union band, and there was a satisfactory quartet of principal vocalists. Mr. Andrew Myles of the Choral Union, who has worked so hard in the musical department of the Foundry Boys' Society, conducted the Oratorio.

A successful performance of Barnett's "Paradise and the Peri," was given by the Pollokshields Musical Association, on December 29, in the Dixon Hall, Mr. W. T. Hoeck conducting.

At the Choral Union Concert of December 29, the chief attractions were Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, selections from Moszkowski's Suite "Aus Aller Herren Lander," and Max Bruch's Violin Concerto, No. 1, in G minor, in which Herr Sons took the solo part.

A Concert was given on the 30th of the same month by the Partick Musical Association, under Mr. Hugh McNabb. The programme was partly sacred and partly secular, Mendelssohn's "Loreley" being included in the latter.

On New Year's Day were given two performances by the Choral Union, one being that of Handel's "Messiah," in the forenoon, according to custom; and the other an orchestral selection in the evening. Madame Samuell, Miss A. de Lisle, Mr. William Nicholl, formerly of Glasgow, and Mr. Andrew Black (in room of Signor Foli, indisposed) were the principals in the Oratorio. The chorus sang with much taste, and Mr. Black, a most promising local vocalist, made a genuine impression in the bass solos in the Oratorio and at the Concert in the evening.

The Hillhead Musical Association, which is conducted by Mr. W. T. Hoeck, gave the first of its two annual Concerts on the 5th ult. Gade's Cantata "Psyche" was performed.

The principal feature of the Orchestral Concert of the 4th ult., was the No. 4 Symphony of Beethoven, in pursuance of the intention to give the complete set during the season. There were also excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" music, together with the Spanish Ballet music from "Le Cid," by Massenet. At the Saturday Popular Concert of the 8th ult., Schumann's No. 1 Symphony was performed, also Spohr's Violin Concerto, No. 8, "Dramatic," with Mr. John F. Dunn, a young and very talented member of the orchestra, in the chief part.

Miss Fanny Davies appeared at the Subscription Concert of the 11th ult., in Schumann's Concerto for piano and orchestra, and Miss Marie Schneider, who had sung at the Saturday Popular Concert previously, was the vocalist. The "Harold in Italy" Symphony, Mr. C. W. Doyle acceptably taking the viola solo part, and the "Leonora" Overture (No. 3) of Beethoven, were the principal features of the Popular Concert of the 15th ult. An unpretending little piece for the strings in pizzicato, by Mr. Allan Macbeth, choral trainer of the Union, was played for the first time, and pleased very much.

On Tuesday evening following, the Concert was a choral one—Bach's Cantata "Thou Guide of Israel," Schubert's "Song of Miriam," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" were the works performed. Madame Valleria was announced as one of the vocal soloists, but did not appear, having declined to fulfil her engagement. From published correspondence, it may be stated in general terms that the intention to sing the "Stabat Mater" in English had to do with this step on the part of the lady. Mrs. Shepherd, of Glasgow, and Mrs. Haden, of Dundee, took Madame Valleria's place respectively in the "Song of Miriam" and "Stabat Mater." The other principals were Miss Marion Burton, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. W. H. Brereton. The chorus sang excellently, on the whole, in the very different styles of music they were called upon to expound, and the principal vocalists rendered their parts in a manner which left little or nothing to be desired, remembering especially the extremely short notice given in the case of two of the ladies.

Concerts have been given likewise on Thursday evenings, both as part of the Subscription set, and at Saturday popular prices. The latter have not been so well attended, probably because they are less known or the night less remembered. At the Thursday evening Subscription Concert of the 20th ult., were played H. Gadsby's Orchestral Scene "The Forest of Arden," the Piano Concerto of Beethoven, No. 5, in E flat, with Mr. Max Pauer as solo pianist; and Schumann's No. 4 Symphony in D minor. Mr. Iver McKay sang Beethoven's "Adelaide," and "Il mio tesoro" from "Don Giovanni."

Beethoven's No. 7 Symphony, together with an excellent selection of shorter pieces, was played at the Popular Orchestral Concert of Saturday evening, the 22nd ult., the hall being quite crowded. Goetz's Symphony in F was played at the Subscription Concert of the Tuesday following, and Mr. J. F. Dunn appeared in the solo part in Gade's Concerto for violin. Miss Thudichum was the vocalist on both occasions. Mr. Stavenhagen gave a Pianoforte Recital in the Queen's Rooms on the 25th ult.

The Choral Union Orchestra has given four Subscription Concerts at Greenock during the season; at one of these the Overture "Cior Mhor," by Mr. H. McCunn, a native of Greenock, and the holder of a Scholarship in the Royal College of Music, was performed.

A Sunday evening series of Concerts of orchestral music has been commenced here lately, by a Society called the Glasgow Orchestral Union, but they are not by any means countenanced by the respectable part of the community.

MUSIC IN SOUTH WALES.

During Christmas week a great many events of interest occurred. Perhaps I ought to give special mention of the rendering, at the Oddfellows' Hall, Dowlais, on Boxing Day, of Handel's Oratorio "Joshua"—then performed, it is believed, for the first time in South Wales. The choir consisted of 150 members of the Dowlais Harmonic Society, and the artists were Madame Gertrude Lewis (in the absence, through indisposition, of Madame Gwenfil Davies), Miss Marian Price, Mr. Dyfed Lewis, and Mr. D. Hughes. The orchestra was led by Mr. J. O. Brooke (Bristol), and consisted of about twenty performers; accompanist (harmonium), Mr. D. Rhondda Davies. The audiences were, both afternoon and evening, large. The choir was well balanced, and the choruses were sung with great precision and effect. On the 20th ult., the Oratorio was repeated at the Drill Hall, Merthyr. There was a very large audience present, and financially the undertaking was a great success. At the outset it was announced by Mr. Davies (chairman of the Choir Committee), that he had received a telegram from Madame Gertrude Lewis stating that she had been suddenly taken ill. The leading soprano was therefore absent, a circumstance which naturally interfered with the success of the performance. The singing of the choir gave great satisfaction, and the solos of Miss Eleanor Rees (contralto), rendered very artistically, were invariably applauded. Both performances were conducted by Mr. Dan Davies.

On December 29 the Cardiff Musical Association, under the leadership of Mr. Walter Scott, gave a performance, in the Park Hall, of "The Messiah." The audience was not very large. The principals were Miss M. Fenna, Miss E. Dones, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. Brereton (in place of Mr. Thomas Kempton). The organist was Mr. Lemare (Sheffield). The choir was not so well balanced as usual, the men's voices on one or two occasions being too prominent.

There was a large attendance at the Chair Eisteddfod, at Pontypridd, on the last Monday of the old year. Mr. W. Abraham, M.P., presided; adjudicator, Dr. Parry, Swansea. Three choirs—viz., Merthyr United, Treorky United, and Aberaman United, competed for a prize of £30 for the best rendering, by choirs of from 150 to 200 voices, of "Rise up, arise" (Mendelssohn). The Treorky choir (Mr. W. Thomas, Conductor) was victorious. In the evening, Dr. Parry conducted a rendering of his opera, "Blodwen." On December 26, a successful meeting was held at the Town Hall, Brecon, under the auspices of the local Court of Foresters. The Rev. Prebendary Garnons Williams presided. Mr. Harding, of St. Peter's, Carmarthen, was the adjudicator. For singing the "National Anthem," a small choir led by Mr. Tom Price, was awarded a prize of two guineas. No other choir sang. Mr. Morgan's party took a similar prize for the rendering of Becker's "The little Church." In the competition between choirs of fifty voices, in "Sing unto God" ("Judas Maccabæus"), the Plough Choir, conducted by Mr. Tom Price, Pendre, took the prize of £10. A Concert followed. On the same day, the fifth Choir Eisteddfod, in connection with the Tredegar Cymmrodorion Society, took place at Tredegar. The presidents were Mr. W. Davies in the morning, and Mr. D. W. Phillips in the afternoon. Dr. Frost, Cardiff, was the musical adjudicator; Conductor, Mr. T. L. Davies. In the leading choral competition, for a prize of £20 and £3 to Conductor, the test piece was "Worthy is the Lamb." Four choirs competed, and the Blaenavon Choir, led by Mr. John Davies, was successful. The Concert in the evening was under the presidency of Dr. Brown. At Morriston (Swansea) Eisteddfod, the prize of £30 for the best rendering of "Be not afraid" was taken by the Neath Choir. On Boxing Day there was an Eisteddfod at the Albert Hall, Newport (Mon.). "We never will bow down" was the test-piece in the chief choral competition. Pontypool and Newport United competed, but Mr. D. Emlyn Jones, Hereford, the adjudicator, withheld half of the prize. Mr. J. Phillips presided at the Eisteddfod held on Christmas Day at Tongwynlais, near Cardiff; Mr. R. R. Price, musical adjudicator. The English Baptist Chapel Choir was awarded the prize of £4 for the best choral rendering of "Jerusalem, my glorious home." At Abercarn Eisteddfod, on Christmas Day, the Blaina Choir took the chief prize of £15 for the best rendering of "Worthy is the Lamb." The Cymmrodorion Eisteddfod at Wood Street Chapel, Cardiff, on Christmas Day, was largely attended; Mr. David Bowen, Abercarn, musical adjudicator. Nine choirs from a distance competed for the chief choral prize of £20 and a silver medal. The test piece was "Dafod mae Rhwymau Caethiwed," and the winning choir was the Blaenrhondda United, under the leadership of Mr. Joseph Jones. An Eisteddfod was held at Porth, in the Rhondda, on Christmas Day, Mr. Moses Cule, Pontypridd, presiding; musical adjudicator, Mr. W. C. Samuel, Swansea. The Treherbert Choir won the prize of £20 in the chief choral competition. On Christmas Day there was also an Eisteddfod at Cefn, Merthyr.

Dr. Parry's opera, "Blodwen," was performed with great success by the Aberdare Choral Union on Christmas and Boxing Days, and on the following night, at Aberdare.

A Choir of 350 voices is being organised at Dowlais in view of the chief choral competition at the National Eisteddfod in London. A smaller choir is also being formed in view of the £100 choral competition.

A new organ was opened at the Deer Park Chapel, Tenby, on New Year's Eve, by Mr. C. Videon Harding, St. Peter's, Carmarthen.

The Cardiff Choral Society gave a performance of the Oratorio "Samson" on the 26th ult.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, January 10.

The height of the season has been reached in the chief cities of the United States without furnishing subjects of very great interest to the chronicler of musical events. In the metropolis the German Opera absorbs the greater part of public interest, and this meritoriously, both in respect of the works offered and the excellence of the representations. The only new production since my last letter was Goldmark's "Merlin," which was brought forward with considerable sumptuousness of stage attire on January 3. The solo parts had been placed in excellent hands, especially Viviane's (the Vivien of Tennyson's Idyls), and those who are familiar with the establishment in Vienna at which the work had its first performance, on November 19, as well as with the local institution, have no doubt that in some respects, chiefly, however, in the singing of Fräulein Schumann, the New York representations come nearer to the purposes of the librettist and composer than do the Viennese. The opera, moreover, has achieved scarcely more than a succes d'estime. The book is cleverly made, from a literary point of view, and its perusal before the music was seen or heard, aroused the keenest anticipations of pleasure. But from the stage the drama is disappointing. There is so much affection for King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table in the hearts of all lovers of English literature, that to see them reduced to the most uninteresting of conventional operatic marionettes is well nigh intolerable. Yet to this complexion are Arthur, Lancelot, Garvain, Modred, and Sir Bedivere reduced in this newest version of the enchantment of Merlin. The only characters that have real dramatic vitality are Merlin and Viviane, whom Herr Lipiner and Herr Goldmark have united to clothe with sympathetic interest. Next to them in dramatic importance is a Demon who embodies the evil principle of the drama; but he is not effectively handled. If we are to have a personal devil who is all devil, and not a devil with a Mephistophelian outfit of fascinating graces, he would much better be our old friend of fairy extravaganza, who makes his entrances like an elongated cannon-ball shot through a trap-door, and who vanishes with equal suddenness and unconventionality, than a mongrel creature like the demon of this opera. In fact, the authors of the work have tried, but failed, to effect a fusion between the natural and supernatural elements of their play. There is a superabundance of magical transformations of the landscape in it, and while this reads prettily in the libretto, it clogs the action of the piece, and interrupts the story. In the handling of the supernatural, moreover, Goldmark has not been happy. For its expression he has the instrumental language, but not the ideas. Thus far (and up to date we have had three representations of the work) his choruses of mystical folk have not excited the charm which they bade fair to exert when they were first scanned in the score; but this is probably more the fault of the performance than the composer. The critics, especially those who are so strongly tinctured with Wagnerism that they know only one standard of judgment, have been very severe in their condemnation of the music. It must be confessed that from one point of view they had an easy task. Herr Goldmark in the composition of this score has permitted himself to be so strongly influenced by Wagner in the treatment of his orchestra that he has not always respected the difference between meum and tuum. He has borrowed many phrases as well as many effects, and has repeatedly copied his manner of construction. His melodic invention was lame also, and though there are melodies in plenty of short and long periods, there is not one which commands respect for downright beauty or dramatic expressiveness. On the other hand, the amount of commonplace is astounding, in view of the experience, taste, and skill which we know are Herr Goldmark's. But, to offset this long catalogue of faults, it must be said, in justice to the composer, that the mastery of musical technique displayed in the work, especially in the instrumental part, is colossal, and that, though we cannot characterise them as uniformly successful, we are bound to admit a multitude of evidences that Herr Goldmark performed his task with a seriousness of purpose which is thoroughly admirable. In his dialogue he attempted to keep clear of Wagner's musical phraseology, and to this end adopted a sustained style of melody, which at times is impressively beautiful, but which has its drawback in an unmistakable monotony, and in the sluggishness of its flow. All who know Herr Goldmark's music know how greatly it has been infected with Orientalism, no matter what the form. This he has successfully avoided in "Merlin," and doubtless the effort to keep out of a current of thought which, though foreign to us, is entirely natural with him, has a good deal to do with the comparative failure of the result of his long labours. In "The Queen of Sheba" his predilection for Eastern cadences and orchestral colour had an appropriate field of exposition.

Of orchestral novelties we have had only one of real interest within the month. Mr. Damrosch, with more zeal than discretion, brought out Brahms's new Symphony in E minor at the second Concert of the Symphony Society, on December 11. The reading was not satisfactory and the work was received with but a modicum of approbation. Very different was the reception accorded to some very familiar music at the first of Herr Seidl's Symphonic Concerts (or "Soirées," as they are foolishly called), at Steinway Hall, on December 23. Herr Seidl has made himself extremely popular with his work in connection with the German Opera, which certainly has been marvellously excellent. Musicians and critics have not yet ceased to wonder at his achievement with "Die Meistersinger" last year, and "Tristan und Isolde" this. Last year he received the unusual compliment of a dinner at the hands of the critics, and this year his production of "Tristan" was celebrated in the same manner. The leading critics of the city invited him to the "English room" of the Hoffman house and entertained him with an elegant dinner, at which addresses were made by Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, of The Tribune, who presided; the Hon. Carl Schurz, Minister of the Interior, under the administration of President Hayes; Otto Floersheim, Editor of The Musical Courier; H. T. Finck, the uncompromising Wagnerite of The Evening Post; P. G. Hubert, of The Star; Udo Brachvogel, Editor of the Billetristisches Journal, and others. Herr Niemann was also present at this dinner, and his surprise at seeing what he had come to look upon as the normal relation of artist and critic reversed, was most amusingly expressed. But this has nothing to do with Herr Seidl's Concert. At this, with an excellent orchestra, he performed Beethoven's A major Symphony, Wagner's Funeral March from "Die Götterdämmerung" and "Siegfried Idyl," and Liszt's "Mazeppa." The chief interest lay in the reading of the Symphony, which was unconventional to a degree that aroused a serious inquiry as to how far these emotional young Germans should be permitted to go in their desire to put new vitality into classic compositions. In this case the audience became almost frantic in their manifestation of delight, and the newspapers echoed the enthusiasm. Herr Seidl's principal departures from the accepted readings were in the first and last movements, which were performed with the utmost freedom with respect to changes of tempo and dynamic effects. At this Concert, too, Fräulein Aus der Ohe, a young German, put herself into the front rank of piano players, with an astonishingly vigorous and brilliant performance of Liszt's E flat Concerto and E major Polonaise. Last Saturday she played Chopin's E minor Concerto at the third Concert of the Symphony Society.

During the holiday week, from December 27 to January 1, the National Opera Company gave seven performances in Brooklyn, bringing forward successively "The Huguenots," "Faust," "Aïda," "Lohengrin," "The Flying Dutchman," Massé's "Galathea" and "Marriage of Jeannette," besides two ballets. Financially the season was unsuccessful. The company, which is now concluding a two weeks' season in Boston, has occupied a large place in public attention ever since the St. Louis engagement, because of the published tittle-tattle concerning its finances and the troubles of its administration. The facts are that its career from the start has been on an unwisely inflated basis. It is an enormously expensive institution, and has steadily lost fabulous sums of money, which were subscribed out of patriotic and friendly motives by friends of the prime movers in the enterprise. It has gone on, however, in spite of its reverses, and next year will doubtless see it on a perfectly normal and sensible footing—see it, in fact, where it should have been started. The two years' work done will not, I fear, show up as well in the artistic account as it would have done had Mr. Thomas insisted on doing only what could be well done. The future of the enterprise will doubtless depend very much on the results of the season in New York city during the month of March. Boston received the performances (which suffer from amateurishness in the histrionic and musical departments, and extravagance in the scenic and ballet) kindly. What New York will do is doubtful, for New York, unlike Boston, has been entertained with opera on a high artistic plane four times a week ever since November 8.

Chorally, the feature of the month which I am trying to pass in review was the performance of "The Legend of St. Elizabeth," in memory of Liszt, by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, on December 18. Mr. Thomas conducted, and as the choir had sung the work two seasons ago, the performance was eminently satisfactory.

NATIONAL SOCIETY OF PROFESSIONAL MUSICIANS.

The annual Conference of the above Society was held on the 5th, 6th, and 7th ult., in Birmingham, and was very largely attended by ladies and gentlemen from all the sections. After a greeting to the Society offered at the Grand Hotel by the "Birmingham Musical Guild," on Tuesday evening, the 4th ult., the assembled musicians were, on the next morning, received in the magnificent new municipal buildings by the Mayor, Alderman Thomas Martineau, who cordially welcomed them to the town, expressed the most kindly interest in their deliberations and general welfare, and placed the council chamber, a very handsome and luxuriously furnished hall, at their disposal.

In addition to the courtesy of the municipal authorities, the musicians of the district voluntarily proffered the utmost assistance; and were, under the direction of Mr. S. S. Stratton, indefatigable in the performance of published and unpublished works by members of the Society.

At the close of the words of welcome by the Mayor, on Wednesday morning, Dr. Henry Hiles (Manchester) took the chair, and, after thanking his Worship for the geniality of his welcome to Birmingham, and briefly explaining the constitution of the Society, called upon the Hon. General Secretary, Mr. E. Chadfield (Derby), to read a report of the progress of the Association since the previous Conference, held in London during the first week of the last year. Mr. Chadfield stated that in some of the districts—especially the South Midland—the number of members had been doubled during the twelve months, that the total strength now reached 470, and that very strong hopes are entertained that, before the next Conference, Scotland will have its principal musical centres included in the organisation of the Society, and actively combining with the English members to promote the general welfare of the art and its followers. The report further stated that the examinations instituted by the Society—and extended to those localities only where demanded by the resident members—have proved most acceptable, and are being rapidly sought for in many populous centres.

Dr. J. H. Gower (Trent College) reported respecting his recent visit to America, and the correspondence which he had held with the officers of the Music Teachers' Association of the United States. Mr. Alfred Gilbert (London) read a somewhat long paper on the distinction between the professional musician and the amateur.

After lunch, Dr. Arnold (Winchester) drew attention to the recent movement for the registration of the Society. From the statement made, and from the paper issued by the Central Council, it appears that, in accordance with a motion pressed by two sections of the Society, far more than from any conviction of its importance, the Board of Trade had been applied to to register the Society as the College of Organists, the Tonic Sol-fa College, and many similar associations are registered; that the application was referred to the Principal of the Royal College of Music, who immediately wrote demanding further information respecting the Society and the names of its promoters.

After a discussion, in which it was stated that registration could not in any way advance the Society or forward the reputation of its certificates, it was resolved unanimously "That this meeting views with indignation the conduct of the Board of Trade in referring to an irresponsible adviser the application for registration, after all the conditions prescribed by Act of Parliament had been fulfilled."

Dr. Hiles then introduced a series of resolutions upon the requirements for musical degrees, stating that the reaction from the old state of things—in which distinction was frequently granted upon too easy terms—was now so strong that Universities appeared to be emulating one another to impose such stringent conditions that, ultimately, the Doctor of Music must become the most thoroughly educated of all men. A long and earnest discussion ensued upon the advisable conditions for candidates for musical degrees; and it was finally decided (a) that music ought, in all examinations, to be treated entirely from a modern and practical point of view; and (b) that, without giving any unfair advantage, a frank recognition of the exacting nature and high disciplinary influence of a thorough training in music (such as was advised) should be accorded, and a fair revision of the requirements for graduates should be made.

On the following morning, under the presidency of Mr. E. Prout (owing to the unavoidable absence of Mr. G. Riseley), the Conference was resumed, Mr. A. F. Smith, Mus. Bac. (Derby), reading a very instructive paper upon "Aids to the Advancement of Musical Art," contrasting the £147,156 now spent by the Government in forwarding mere rudimentary training in singing, with the £750 granted in support of any culture which could be deemed of high character, and affording much information respecting the primary schools and the training colleges of the kingdom. Mr. Praeger seconded Mr. Smith's motion "that, in the opinion of this Conference, it is advisable to establish independent colleges in various large centres throughout the country, for the cultivation of music in all and particularly its orchestral branches, and that the General Council be requested to forward the matter in every possible way." The chairman and several others supported the arguments of Mr. Smith. Dr. Hiles advocated the teaching of orchestral and especially of bowed instruments in the Board and other elementary schools, the drafting into classes of higher grades those students who evince a decided talent, and the admission into local and entirely independently managed colleges such as, after sufficient preparation, pass examinations proving them to be qualified to advance the progress of the art. Uniformity in music, as in other matters, he declared to be impossible as well as undesirable. Mr. Smith's proposition was passed without dissent, and Dr. Crow (Ripon) succeeded in carrying a rider to it, protesting against the expenditure of public money for the teaching (except in infant schools) of singing without the use of any kind of notation; although a strong opinion was expressed that "infants" of six years growth may be, and in thousands of cases are, taught from notes, and that the exception made on their behalf (or rather on behalf of an exacting time-table) is only a giving up of principle in favour of expediency.

Mr. Stratton argued for the compilation by the General Council of a catalogue of worthy English music, for which he promised to prepare the outline.

On the third morning Mr. Arthur Page, F.C.O. (Nottingham), presided, and urged the importance of ear tests, even in the earliest stages of teaching, adducing arguments and examples which entirely proved the feasibility of imparting to the youngest children a power of distinguishing the sounds of a scale, or of a simple melody, sufficiently to render absurd the exemption of six-year-old "infants" from a real training. Mr. C. E. Stephens (London) read a paper on the teaching of Counterpoint, freely criticising the methods of various theorists. Mr. Praeger very pertinently remarked that it has been too much the custom to appoint musical policemen ready to take up anybody possessing ideas not in accordance with the police regulations, and that those who believe in ancient rules as the only roads to happiness should stick to them; but, if the art of music is to advance, we must progress with the times.

After a paper by Dr. Fisher (Blackpool) upon "The Use and Abuse of Technical Practice," and a short interval, an afternoon meeting was held to arrange for the next Conference, which is to take place in London, January 4 to 6 of 1888. Mr. Dawber, Mus. B. (Wigan), the Hon. Sec. of the North-Western branch of the Association, suggested some points for consideration during the intermediate time, and the Conference terminated. In the evening, Mr. F. H. Cowen presided at a banquet given at the Grand Hotel, attended by the Mayor, several distinguished townsmen, and a large number of members and guests of the Society.

PRODUCTION OF "NORDISA."

(From our Special Correspondent.)

Mr. Frederic Corder's long-awaited Opera, "Nordisa," was produced at the Court Theatre, Liverpool, on the 26th ult., with emphatic success. The event was regarded with deep interest, not only by local supporters of the Carl Rosa Opera Company (for which troupe the work was expressly written), but by musicians generally; while several critics came from London, and elsewhere, on purpose to attend a première that might almost be described as a "double-first," inasmuch as no English opera of important dimensions had ever seen light for the first time in the provinces before. Hence an audience that filled Mr. Rosa's theatre to its utmost capacity, and, as regards ability to pass judgment on the new work, was by no means unworthy of the occasion. In "Nordisa," as in his recent Cantata "The Bridal of Triermain," Mr. Corder again fulfils the labours of librettist as well as of composer. Founding his story on the plot of an old French play, "La Bergère des Alpes," he has chosen for a locale a mountain village in the North of Norway, period 1750, and introduced certain incidents, which further help to lend freshness to a well-worn dramatic theme. In a preface the author states that his "libretto has purposely been written on old-fashioned lines, rather than according to modern models, partly because it does not pretend to be a Musik-drama, or grand opera, but simply a Singspiel, or romantic light opera, such as Wagner recommended all beginners to write." This may be taken in explanation of a great deal in "Nordisa" that can hardly be said to correspond with preconceived notions concerning Mr. Corder's aims and tendencies. For, truth to tell, there is quite as much of the old-fashioned in the model of his music as in that of his libretto. Rhythmical melody abounds, there are concerted pieces of all sorts and sizes, the simple English ballad is present, well-nigh in its pristine shape, and, wonderful to relate, Mr. Corder has not disdained to begin his opera with that most welcome of old-fashioned rareties, a regular overture in orthodox form. Surely there was subtle intention in all this. Surely Mr. Corder made up his mind that, in his first opera at least, he would be "understanded of the people." Anyhow, the result has been fully achieved. Never, we should say, has music been followed with greater ease than has that of the first and third acts of "Nordisa." The bright, tuneful choruses, the characteristic ballet-music, the melodious trio and quartet, the charming Cradle-song for Minna (Madame Georgina Burns), the beautiful and oft-repeated melody of trust sung by the heroine (Madame Julia Gaylord), the extremely effective air, "Scent of the pine," that "makes" the part of Andreas Brand (Mr. Max Eugene)—these and other prominent numbers met with an instant and rapturous appreciation such as only music with tune in it can command on a first hearing from other than special audiences. The second act of "Nordisa" stands in a different category. Here Mr. Corder did not write down for his public, and here, consequently, it is his truer self that we see reflected. It is hardly credible that the prolonged and impassioned love duet which occupies half of this act—a scene replete with dramatic feeling, and essentially Wagnerian in treatment—can be by the same composer who, in the next act, gives his baritone a ballad of the most pronounced Balferian type. No serious opera with which we are acquainted affords the same startling contrast. It serves as another proof of Mr. Corder's versatility and, better still, of the real power that is at his command when he likes to use it. One happy outcome of this strange combination is that "Nordisa" possesses elements which appeal to every class of opera-goer, on which account we anticipate for it a wide popularity. The story is interesting, the lyrics are admirable, and the dramatic situations are striking. The "Avalanche" scene, as realised by Mr. Carl Rosa, would suffice to make the second act, apart from the wealth of resource lavished by the composer on this section of his opera. The ensembles are well constructed and the instrumentation is marked by a grace and fancy that lends welcome distinction to more than one number, as does the "local colour," both real and imitated, which skilfully heightens the Scandinavian character of the story. These somewhat discursive remarks have been intended to convey only an indication of the general character of "Nordisa," an adequate notice of which we must reserve until the production of the opera in London. Enough, meanwhile, that its reception in Liverpool was of the most enthusiastic description. It had been staged with the utmost care, and the performance, conducted by Mr. Goossens, was creditable in a high degree. Madame Julia Gaylord as Nordisa, Madame Burns as Minna, Mr. Edward Scovell as Count Oscar, Mr. Sauvage as Frederick, and Mr. Max Eugene as Brand, acquitted themselves of their tasks in able fashion, the ladies being especially good. The composer and Mr. Carl Rosa were called and loudly cheered at the close of the representation.

OBITUARY.

In our last issue it was our painful duty to record the loss which the musical world sustained by the death of Dr. E. T. Chipp, and we believe a few brief notes concerning him will be read with interest.

Edmund Thomas Chipp, the eldest son of Paul Chipp, the well-known harpist and principal drummer of his day, was born in London on Christmas Day, 1823. At the early age of seven he became one of the choristers of his Majesty's (William IV.) Chapels Royal, under the late William Hawes. He sang at the coronation of Her Majesty (a fact that has double interest in this Jubilee year), and remained in the choir until the age of seventeen. On leaving the chapel he devoted himself to the study of the organ, under the elder Cooper, and of the violin, under Nadaud and Tolbecque. As a violinist he soon attained a prominent position in the Philharmonic and other orchestras, and in 1844 became a member of Her Majesty's Private Band.

In 1847 he succeeded Dr. Gauntlett as Organist of St. Olave, Southwark, which he resigned in 1852 on his election as Organist of St. Mary-at-Hill, Eastcheap. Subsequently he became Organist of Holy Trinity, Paddington. Mr. Chipp's skill as an organist was by no means confined to his church duties; he was often called upon to display the resources of new organs. On these occasions he frequently performed the whole of his programme from memory. The writer of these notes has more than once known him thus to play all six of Mendelssohn's grand Organ Sonatas during a single recital. In 1849 Mr. Chipp occupied the position of Solo Organist at the Birmingham Festival; for this he wrote a set of Concert Variations on Haydn's theme, known as "God preserve the Emperor." These variations were eminently calculated to display Mr. Chipp's exceptional attainments as a pedalist, and his marked success at Birmingham did much to establish his reputation as one of the leading organists of his day. On Mr. Best's retirement from the Panopticon, Mr. Chipp became Organist to that Institution, where a daily Organ Recital was one of the principal attractions.

In 1857 Mr. Chipp took his Mus. Bac. degree at Cambridge, and in 1860 proceeded to the higher degree of Mus. Doc. He was the first doctor in music created during the professorship of Sir William Sterndale Bennett.

Dr. Chipp was always an enthusiastic admirer of Mendelssohn. He was among the first, probably he was the very first, to introduce Mendelssohn's great organ works in public performances; but his admiration found expression in another way. Between 1850 and 1855 he constructed, with his own hand, from the single parts, full scores of all Mendelssohn's works which were not then published in that form. The intervals of leisure he enjoyed while attending the Court at Windsor as a member of Her Majesty's Private Band were chiefly occupied in this work. The collection still exists, a monument of zeal, labour, and love.

In 1862 Dr. Chipp received the appointment of Organist of the newly erected Ulster Hall at Belfast. Here he was also Conductor of the Anacreontic and Classical Harmonists Societies, and of the Vocal Union, a Society which he founded and established. He further held the post of Organist at St. George's Church. In 1865 the appointment of Organist to the Kinnaird Hall, Dundee, was offered to, and accepted by, Dr. Chipp; this he held in conjunction with the office of Organist of St. Paul's, Edinburgh, in which city he resided. In the latter part of the year 1866, on the death of Mr. Janes, the position of Organist and Magister Choristorum of Ely Cathedral was conferred upon him. These offices he continued to hold to the time of his death. Quite recently the College of Organists conferred their Fellowship (honoris causâ) on Dr. Chipp. The last occasions on which he performed in London were at one of the Bow and Bromley Recitals and at the Henry Smart Memorial Recital at the Royal Academy of Music.

Early in December last Dr. Chipp, who had been out of health for some time past, left England, accompanied by his wife, for the South of France, hoping to return in the spring benefited by the rest and change. But it was not to be; he had not long reached Nice ere he was seized with serious illness and on December 17 he passed away, to the great grief of his family, and the sincere regret of his many friends. The remains were brought back to England, and on Christmas Eve (the eve of his sixty-third birthday) he was buried in the family grave at Highgate Cemetery.

Among his works may be mentioned his Oratorio of "Job," first performed at Belfast; "Naomi," a Sacred Idyll, composed in 1868; and three Services in A, E, and D, composed while at Trinity Church, Paddington, and still in MS. Works well known to organists are his "Twenty-four Sketches for the Organ," the Variations on "The Harmonious Blacksmith," on an Original Theme in A, and on "God preserve the Emperor." He also published several sets of songs, and a series of "Twilight Fancies" for piano. There are still many unpublished works in the possession of his family. Two Anthems, one of them composed for the St. Ethelreda Festival at Ely in 1873, are now in the hands of Messrs. Novello for publication.

HOPES are entertained of persuading Madame Schumann to visit London for the close of the "Popular" season, and the special celebration of the thousandth Concert. The artists who took part in the first Concert (February 14, 1859) were Messrs. Wieniawski, Ries, Doyle, Schreurs, Piatti, Wilbye, Cooper, Benedict, Santley, and E. Hopkins; Misses Palmer and Stabbach. Of the gentlemen, Messrs. Ries, Doyle, Piatti, Santley, and Hopkins are still living and working. Mr. Charles Hallé appeared on March 7, M. Sainton on March 9, Madame Arabella Goddard on March 21, and Herr Joachim on May 16. All these artists are, happily, still with us.

THE correspondent of the Daily Telegraph at Milan telegraphs with reference to Verdi's new opera, under date January 26: "The production of 'Otello' is definitely fixed for Thursday, February 3. The opera would have been produced on Saturday, the 29th inst., but for the illness of Signor Tamagno. Full rehearsals have just been commenced under Verdi's personal direction. Admission to these rehearsals is rigorously denied at present. The books of words will probably be issued on Saturday, but the copies of the music will not be ready till Thursday, 3rd prox. The manuscript was not delivered to Ricordi till November 7, and the printing is all behind. Verdi is staying at the Hotel Milan, where he entertained at dinner last night Signor Boïto, the librettist, and Signor Faccio, the chef d'orchestre. A large number of musicians has arrived here from all parts of Europe. Verdi is opposed to any discussion of the work before the rehearsals shall be completed. Rumour speaks favourably of 'Otello,' however."

THE Higher Examinations of Trinity College, London, took place during the past month—Examiners: Mr. John Francis Barnett, Mr. Henry R. Bird, Mr. F. Corder, Mr. A. E. Drinkwater, M.A., Professor James Higgs, Mus. B., the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, Mus. B., Dr. Warwick Jordan, Dr. Haydn Keeton, Dr. A. H. Mann, Mr. M. Maybrick, Signor Papini, Mr. W. Pinney, Mus. B., Professor Gordon Saunders, Mus. D., Dr. Armand Semple, B.A., Professor E. H. Turpin, Professor Bradbury Turner, Mus. B., Mr. G. E. Bambridge, and Dr. C. W. Pearce—the following is the result:—Martriculation: Armitage Goodall (Honours), Ethel M. Bonavia Hunt, Ada T. Browning, Susan Fellows, Annie Gilford, Frances M. Howlett, Frederic W. J. Lesser, Ptolemy S. T. Pardy, Richard Pye, George A. Swain, Eliz. A. Watkins, Thos. C. Whittle. Higher Arts: William Ball, Richard Pye. Licentiate in Music: John F. Flitcroft, Williamson J. Reynolds, Mus. B., London. Associate in Music: Alfred Comben, Robert F. Fren, Annie Gilford, Armitage Goodall, Catherine E. Kingdon, Alice M. Linton, Wm. E. Neck, Ptolemy S. T. Pardy, Robt. G. Rothwell, Chas. Shelford, Eliz. A. Watkins, Chas. W. Wilkes, Francis B. Wood. Preliminary Division Associate in Music: Charles F. Passmore. Harmony—Honours Certificate: Annie Bland. Pass Certificate: Helen S. E. Crosby, Emily C. Dixon, Emily S. Dobson, Mary E. R. Ennis. Counterpoint—Pass Certificate: Annie Bland, Arthur W. Rogers. Pianoforte (in alphabetical order)—Associate Pianist: Felix A. E. Butel, Amy M. Denning, James S. Ford, Bessie Griffith, Emma Hodgkins, Annie E. Holdorn, Bessie Morris, Emily E. Pugh, Ada L. Richardson, Ada M. Wilson. Certificated Pianist: Emily Barber, Wm. Bentham, Emily M. Cock, Ella L. Davis, Amy S. H. Dunn, John H. English, Eliz. B. Grose, Eliza Hammond, Marion Hunt, Florence E. Masterson, Florence E. Oatway, Alice M. M. Payne, Mary E. Richards, Edith M. Richardson, Amelia Sanders, Edith M. Sawer, Susanna Turnbull, Rachael A. Wells. Organ—Organ Associate: John J. Flitcroft, Flora Klickmann. Singing—Associate Vocalist: Amy Murray Denning. Violin—Associate Violinist: Walter Aston.

AT the January Examinations of the College of Organists, the following gentlemen obtained the several diplomas of Fellowship and Associateship:—Passed for Fellowship: J. E. Adkins, Kensington; A. T. Blanchett, Slough; M. J. Monk, Mus. Bac., Banbury; H. Newboult, Bradford; F. A. Sewell, Kensington; T. J. Watts, Mus. Bac., Cambridge; H. W. Weston, Battersea; A. A. Yeatman, Finchley. Passed for Associateship: J. H. Adams, Peterborough; H. Allen, Leicester; H. P. Allen, Tylehurst; G. Bard, Kilburn; D. Bradfield, St. John's Wood; F. W. Blacow, Manchester; W. Bentham, Blackburn; N. H. Brown, Newcastle-on-Tyne; B. A. Cogswell, Meopham; A. D. Culley, Great Yarmouth; E. A. Dicks, Cheltenham; F. A. Fisher, Cardiff; W. W. Harvey, St. Neots; H. Hallowell, Droylesden; N. B. Hibbert, Peterborough; A. L. Holloway, Fakenham; G. F. Howells, Abergavenny; E. Iles, Bury St. Edmunds; A. Lake, Streatham; F. Leeds, Lewisham; J. Nicholson, Ware; A. Oake, Southampton; C. E. B. Price, Ely; H. Rose, Tamworth; A. T. Robinson, Ventnor; J. Shearer, Newmains, N.B.; and B. Whitworth, South Ossett.

THE first dinner of the Old Choir Boys of St. Paul's Cathedral, was held at the Holborn Restaurant, on Saturday, the 8th ult. The chair was occupied by Dr. Stainer, and the vice by Mr. Henry Gadsby (both "Old Boys"). There were also present Messrs. W. J. Hill (the well-known comedian), J. Jeffreys, Heney, J. Brown, Pockington, A. Godfrey, Liddell, Eyre, Tolkien, Walter Pallant (Treasurer), George F. Grover (Secretary), &c. After the loyal toasts had been proposed, Dr. Stainer gave "The Health of the Old Boys," coupled with the names of Mr. Henry Gadsby and Mr. Liddell. The Chairman in a most interesting speech gave a very graphic sketch of the life at St. Paul's, from the time he entered as a chorister, nearly forty years back, up to the present time, the anecdotes of his boy's life being listened to with very great pleasure. He also spoke of the improvement in the services at St. Paul's, and said that, although he was at times twitted for neglecting the old masters, he thought that in encouraging young composers he was only doing his duty to the art of music; and in his opinion when this century had passed away he did not think the English people would have any cause to be ashamed of the English Church music of to-day. Messrs. Henry Gadsby and Liddell responded. The healths of the Secretary and Treasurer were next proposed. Mr. George F. Grover (Secretary), said that he considered the occasion an interesting one for Old St. Paul's Boys, indeed for choir boys all over England. This "Old Boys'" Dinner had been in his mind for some years past, and he assured all present, that however much trouble he had been put to in getting them together, he was amply repaid by their presence; and he trusted that, having been started, it would become an annual event. Mr. W. Pallant (Treasurer) also responded. Mr. Fred. Walker and Mr. Sam Pallant responded to the toast of "The Visitors," and altogether the occasion was most pleasant and enjoyable. The following took part in the music which was performed during the evening:—Messrs. Henry Gadsby, J. Jeffreys, A. Godfrey, Bradberry, Heney, J. Brown, Pocklington, Raymond, Walter Pallant, and George F. Grover.

THE prospectus of the Philharmonic Society for the coming season announces six evening and two morning Concerts, the additional two performances being given in lieu of the privilege, lately accorded to subscribers, of attending the rehearsals. The novelties are a Concerto for Piano-Pédalier, composed expressly for the Society by Gounod, to be performed by Madame Palicot; a Vocal Scena, by Goring Thomas, to be sung by Madame Valleria; a Vocal Duet, by Dr. Stanford, to be sung by Mdlle. Marie de Lido and Mr. Barton McGuckin; a Vocal Scena, by Randegger, composed for the Society; a Suite (Roumanian), by Corder; an Overture ("Kenilworth"), by Sir G. A. Macfarren; and an Ochestral work, by Sir Arthur Sullivan. Brahms's Symphony in E minor (No. 4), Goetz's Symphony in F, Max Bruch's Prelude to the Opera "Loreley," Rietz's "Festival" Overture, a Suite by Bach, Wagner's "Walkürenritt," Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony, and Mozart's Quartet Concertante for oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, with orchestra, will be given for the first time at these Concerts; and Madame Schumann, Herr Leopold Auer, and Herr August Wilhelmj will be heard after a prolonged absence from England. Besides the artists already named, Mdlle. Kleeberg and Miss Fanny Davies are announced, the first to play Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, and the second Sir W. S. Bennett's Capriccio in E, for pianoforte and orchestra; and Miss Ella Russell, who made such an effect at the Royal Italian Opera last season, appears amongst the vocalists. We are glad to say that Sir Arthur Sullivan retains his post of Conductor. The season commences on March 10.

A PERFORMANCE of Gaul's "Holy City" was given at Christ Church, Southwark, after Evensong, on the Feast of the Epiphany. The choir was considerably augmented on the occasion. The solos were well rendered by Master Harman, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. Vernon Drew, and Mr. Thornton Colvin, the latter gentleman's fine voice being heard to great advantage. The choruses were especially well sung, and reflected great credit on the training given. Mr. Ernest C. Winchester (Organist and Choirmaster at the Church) presided at the organ, Master F. Keene at the pianoforte, and Mr. George Winney conducted.

THE Richmond Choral Society, founded nearly five years ago, has now, thanks to the energy and intelligence of its Conductor, Mr. J. Maude Crament, Mus. Bac., Oxon., attained a very high position amongst surburban musical associations. It gave its ninth Concert on Thursday, the 20th ult., when the Conductor's Psalm 145, "I will magnify Thee, O God," was performed for the first time in public. This work, which consists of nine numbers, is scored for full orchestra, and also for strings and organ, the latter very effective arrangement being used on the present occasion. Although the work was intended principally for special thanksgiving services and Church Festivals, the present performance proved its perfect fitness for use in the Concert-room. The choral writing is grand, dignified, and melodious, and exhibits to advantage the composer's skill in counterpoint and knowledge of vocal effect. The solos for soprano and baritone were very favourably received, being given with great refinement by Madame A. Paget and Mr. G. E. Steward; but the most melodious and attractive number was the duet for soprano and tenor sung most effectively by Madame Paget and Mr. E. Bryant. At the conclusion of the work there was an outburst of genuine applause, which testified to the complete satisfaction of the audience. Mr. Easton led the strings and Mr. T. Pettit ably presided at the organ. Mendelssohn's "Athalie" formed the second part, the solos being taken by Madame Paget, Miss Clark, and Miss F. Hoskins.

A CONCERT was given at St. Luke's, Shepherd's Bush, on the evening of the 7th ult., when a testimonial was presented to Mr. F. G. Cole, formerly Organist of that Church, who has received a similar appointment at St. Matthew's, Denmark Hill. The Rev. H. Rowsell, M.A., Vicar of St. Luke's, presented the testimonial, and spoke in high terms of Mr. Cole's punctuality, conscientiousness, and energy, as well as of the pleasant relations that had always been maintained between clergy, organist, and choir. The following was the address:—"This testimonial, together with a gold watch and chain, was presented to F. G. Cole, Esq., F.C.O., L.Mus., by the Clergy, Churchwardens, Choir, and Members of St. Luke's, Uxbridge Road, London, W., whose names are hereunder subscribed, as a mark of their esteem and high appreciation of his services as Organist and Choirmaster during a period of nine years. Dated 7th January, 1887." Mr. Cole expressed his thanks and gratification, and alluded briefly to the kindness that had always been shown to him during his period of office at St. Luke's. A Concert was afterwards given, which was sustained principally by members of the choir, Mr. Cole acting as accompanist, and appearing as soloist in Moszkowski's Scherzo-Valse.

ON Monday, the 3rd ult., there was a lively discussion at the Musical Association following a paper read by Mr. J. S. Curwen on Hymn Tunes. Dr. Stainer, who presided, said the number of irregular metres was becoming so great that if poets continued to multiply them, a stop must be put to their introduction into churches. The charge against recent composers of writing sentimental tunes should really be made against recent poets for writing sentimental hymns. He liked the old passing-notes as they stood in the dear old tunes his mother used to sing. Dr. Stainer played "Mount Ephraim" in its original form, and then denuded of passing-notes, at express speed in the modern fashion, amid great laughter. Most congregational singing now-a-days was too quick. In large churches especially slowness must be cultivated. Among those who also spoke were Major Crawford, Mr. J. S. Shedlock, and Mr. F. G. Edwards. Mr. G. B. Gilbert, F.C.O., played the examples.

ON Thursday evening, the 20th ult., a Concert was given in the St. Barnabas School Room, Pimlico, under the patronage of Her Royal Highness the Princess Christian, on behalf of the fund to erect a gymnasium in the school. The following well known artists gave their services:—Miss Robertson (Mrs. Stanley Stubbs), Miss Fanny Robertson, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. Reginald Groome, Mr. Alfred J. Layton, Mr. George H. Wilby (violin), Mr. W. E. Whitehouse (violoncello), and Mrs. A. J. Layton, F.C.O. (pianoforte). The songs, duets, &c., by the vocalists gave evident satisfaction, but the principal item was Beethoven's Trio in C minor, played with great skill by Mrs. Layton, Mr. Wilby, and Mr. Whitehouse, which was thoroughly enjoyed.

On the 4th ult. an address was given at St. John's, Waterloo Road, by the Vicar, the Rev. A. W. Jephson, on the Life of Handel, illustrations being given on the organ. On the 18th Haydn was the subject, the musical selection including excerpts from "The Creation," "The Seasons," his motetts and quartets. On the 25th Mozart was taken, his 12th Mass, quartets, &c., forming the subject of musical illustration. Mr. Edmund West, assistant organist, was at the organ. Beethoven will be considered on Tuesday, the 1st inst. On Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., a performance of "The Messiah" was given by the choir of the church. The solos were excellently rendered by Miss Linda Rivers, Master Warren, Miss Jennie Bawtree, Mr. H. Cooper, and Mr. Frederick Winton. The choruses were sung with spirit and commendable precision, considering the distance the choir is situated from the organ, and that there is no conductor. Mrs. Dart supported the choruses in the chancel with the pianoforte, and Mr. Henry J. B. Dart presided at the organ.

Mr. William Nicholl gave his third and fourth Vocal Recitals at the Portman Rooms on December 28 and the 11th ult. respectively. As on previous occasions, each programme contained one work of importance, besides a miscellaneous selection of songs. Thus at the third Recital Mr. Henschel's "Serbisches Liederspiel," or settings of ten old Servian poems for four voices, with piano accompaniment, was performed. These songs have been heard on several occasions at the Popular Concerts, and are certainly very clever and fanciful, if not strikingly original. The Concert-giver was assisted in their rendering by Miss Hamlin, Madame Fassett, and Mr. Thorndike, with Miss Mary Carmichael at the piano. Schumann's "Minnespiel" (Op. 101), a work of similar character, was brought forward at the last Recital, Miss Louise Phillips taking the soprano and Mr. Bridson the bass part, the other artists being the same as before. The Recitals have been a decided artistic success, and cannot fail to advance Mr. Nicholl's position as a refined vocalist and musician.

Mr. Carl Armbruster commenced a series of five Saturday afternoon lectures at the Royal Institution of Great Britain, on the 22nd ult., his subject being "Modern Composers of Classical Song." The opening lecture, which was well attended, was devoted to the songs of Liszt, in practical illustration whereof the following settings of eight German poems and one Italian were alternately rendered by Miss Pauline Cramer and Mr. Thorndike—viz., "Mignon Lied," "Ueber allen Gipfeln," and "Es war ein König in Thule" (Goethe); "Du bist wie eine Blume" and "Loreley" (Heine); "In Liebeslust" (Hoffmann von Fallersleben); "Es muss ein Wunderbares sein" (Redwitz); "Die drei Zigeuner" (Lenau); and "Angiolin dal biondo crin" (Bocella). The succeeding lectures are announced to be on "Robert Franz," "Johannes Brahms"; "Rubinstein, Raff, and Grieg"; and "Jensen, Lassen, Holstein, Berlioz, and Wagner"; the last of this interesting series taking place on the 19th inst.

At the Intermediate Examination in Music of the University of London for 1886 (Examiners: R. T. Glazebrook, Esq., M.A., F.R.S.; Dr. Pole, F.R.S.; Prof. Reinold, M.A., F.R.S.; Dr. Stainer, M.A.), the following is the Pass List:—First Division: Thomas Handel Bertenshaw, B.A., private study; Thomas Ely, private study; William Simpson Hannam, Yorkshire Coll., Leeds, and private tuition; Louis Thompson Rowe, private study. Second Division: James Jeremiah Beuzemaker, B.A., private study; Frederick William Shurlock, B.A., private study. And for the degree of B.Mus., Second Division (Examiners: Dr. Pole and Dr. Stainer), Williamson John Reynolds, private tuition.

We have much pleasure in drawing attention to an interesting "History of the Handel and Haydn Society," Boston, U.S.A., written by Charles C. Perkins. Founded in 1815, this Association has gradually attained a position of the highest importance, and materially influenced the progress of music in the States. So faithful a record of the Society's doings recalls numerous recollections of past eminent vocal favourites; and we are certain that the book will be read by very many music-lovers on both sides of the Atlantic.

At the Congregational Soirée held in the schools of Wycliffe Congregational Church, Philpot Street, S.E., on Wednesday, the 19th ult., a very handsome gold locket, set with pearls, and necklet, was presented to Miss Marian Bonallack, G.S.M., by the choir and friends, in consideration of her long and valued services as accompanist. During the evening an excellent selection of music was given, under the direction of the choirmaster, Mr. George Merritt, G.T.S.C., consisting of Mendelssohn's "How lovely are the Messengers," Birch's "Excelsior," and Merritt's "Three merry men," by the choir; two pianoforte duets, by Miss Bonallack and Miss Merritt; Pearson's "Three doughtie men," by Miss Worledge, Miss Ostime, Mr. Merritt, and Mr. Doig; Barnby's "Sweet and low," by Miss Merritt, Master Shearing, Master Merritt, and Mr. Merritt; and Sterndale Bennett's "God is a Spirit," by Master Merritt, Miss Jones, Mr. Bowhill, and Mr. Merritt.

At the first examination for the Degree of Bachelor in Music, at Oxford University, the following have satisfied the Examiners:—A. S. Dale, Brasenose College; C. E. Jolley, New College and Twickenham; S. S. Martyr, Keble College and Sladebridge; H. E. Nichol, New College and Hull; A. M. Richardson, Keble College; R. M. Tamplin, B.A., Keble College; W. Wolstenholme, Worcester College, and of the Blind College, Worcester. Examiners: Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, D.Mus., M.A., Ch. Ch., Professor; C. Hubert H. Parry, D.Mus., M.A., Exeter, Choragus; J. Frederick Bridge, D.Mus., Queen's. In congregation holden at Oxford, on November 11 and December 17, 1886, the following were admitted to the Degree of Bachelor in Music: Franz Koeller, New College and Tiverton, Devon; Frederick J. Simpson, New College and Hillingdon, Middlesex.

An Organ Recital was given on the 20th ult., by Sir Herbert Oakeley, at the Music Class Room, Edinburgh University. The programme was in part In Memoriam of the late Rector of the University. At the first chord of the Dead March the large concourse of students and others rose to their feet. The same deep attention was noticed during the performance of the Funeral Anthem, by Handel, the Quartet and Chorus "Blest are the departed," by Spohr, and the selection from "The Creation." Mendelssohn's melodious Quartet "For the New Year" seemed to form a good transition to the latter and brighter portion of the programme, in which some pieces were new to these Recitals. The extempore treatment of a theme by Pleyel was received with special favour, and vociferously encored.

The Dedication Festival at St. Paul's Cathedral was celebrated in the usual manner, on the 25th ult., by a service, which had for its principal feature the rendering of a selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." The proceedings opened with the playing of the Overture to the Oratorio by a band of fifty, after which the service was gone through in its entirety, the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis being sung to a setting in C by Mr. Eaton Faning, The "St. Paul" selection was sung by the Cathedral choir, reinforced for the occasion by the choir boys from Westminster Abbey, the Temple, and Lincoln's Inn, the soloists being Masters Cockell and Scharbruck, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Winn. Dr. Stainer conducted, and Dr. Martin presided at the organ.

A meeting of the Committee of the Maas Memorial Fund was held at Beaufort House, Strand, on the 17th ult., Mr. Joseph Bennett in the chair. The honorary secretary, Mr. Charles Lyall, stated that the monument had been placed in position over the lamented artist's grave by the sculptor (Mr. Currie, Oxford Street), and the Committee resolved that it should be open for public inspection on Sunday, February 20. It was further stated that, after defraying all expenses connected with the monument, the Committee would be able to institute in perpetuity an annual "Joseph Maas Prize" of £10, for the encouragement of tenor vocalists. The Committee determined to place the amount in trust for the purpose stated, the trustees being Messrs. W. A. Barrett, Joseph Bennett, G. H. Johnstone, and Charles Lyall.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society held their 179th monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday, the 21st ult. The programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection, the solo vocalists being Miss Madeline Hardy, Miss Annie Layton, Mrs. D. Woodhouse, Mr. Montague Shepherd, and Mr. Arthur Roach. Mrs. T. P. Frame gave two pianoforte solos, besides accompanying during the evening; and Mr. H. C. Tonking two violin solos, one of which, Romance in C, was accompanied by the composer, Mr. Henry J. Wood. Special choruses from "St. Paul" were given at the commencement of the Concert, in memory of Mr. J. M. Hucklebridge, the treasurer, and one of the founders of the Society in 1872. Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

HANDEL'S "Samson" was given at the first Concert of the season, by the members of the Crouch End Choral Society, on Tuesday, December 21, at Christ Church Schoolroom, Crouch End. Most of the choruses were very well rendered by the choir. The soloists were Miss Catherine Penna, Miss Marie Middleton, Mr. Maldwyn Humphries, and Mr. T. R. Johnson. There was a small band under the leadership of Mr. E. Halfpenny. Mr. W. Morrow played, with excellent effect, the trumpet obbligato to "Let the bright Seraphim," Mr. J. G. Callcott presided at the harmonium, Miss Preston, the Society's hon. accompanist, at the pianoforte, and Mr. Alfred J. Dye, A.Mus., conducted, as usual. Gounod's "Redemption" will be given in April.

THE fourth annual Dinner of Trinity College, London, took place on Monday, the 10th ult., at the Holborn Restaurant. The meeting was both large and representative, and an undoubted success. The Warden (the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt) occupied the chair, and amongst those present were the following:—Professor James Higgs, Dr. Jacob Bradford, Dr. C. W. Pearce, Dr. Longhurst (Canterbury Cathedral), the Rev. R. Gwynne, B.A., Professor Bradbury Turner, Mus. Bac., Professor Turpin, and Messrs. J. A. Hammond, Wallace Wells, A. W. Sebastian Hoare, E. Burritt Lane, T. J. Hutchinson, G. E. Bambridge, Charles E. Stephens, Walter Bolton, Shelley Fisher (Secretary), Albert Visetti, Arthur Carnall, Mus. Bac., and James Turpin, Mus. Bac.

MR. AMBROSE AUSTIN gave a "National Holiday Festival Concert" at the Albert Hall on the afternoon of Boxing Day. There was a considerable attendance in spite of the terrible weather, and the programme appeared to be heartily enjoyed, more than half the numbers being encored. It is worthy of note that every one of the artists engaged duly arrived, notwithstanding the difficulty of locomotion caused by the snow, among them being Miss Mary Davies, Madame Sterling, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Maybrick, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Charles Banks. The last named vocalist has a powerful tenor voice, and won great applause by his energetic delivery of some popular ballads. Whether he would be equally successful in music of a higher class remains to be seen.

THE usual special Christmas Service was held at St. Columba's (Church of Scotland), Pont Street, Belgravia, on the Sunday after Christmas Day. Dykes's Te Deum in F and Stainer's "O Zion that bringest good tidings" were well rendered by the choir of about thirty voices. Frost's new Introduction and several of the Variations on Mendelssohn's "Festgesang" theme were excellently played by Mr. John Lowe, the Organist and Choirmaster, during the collection, leading (as the composer suggests) to the Hymn "Hark! the herald angels" in place of the last variation. Mr. Lowe's prelude comprised a Pastorale by Zipoli, and the Pastoral Symphony ("Messiah"); his postlude being Lemmens's "Christmas Offertorium."

THE 215th Consecutive Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union took place in the Pimlico Rooms, Warwick Street, S.W., on the 7th ult. The solo artists were Miss Kate Flinn, Miss Annie Dwelley, and Mr. R. E. Miles. Mr. F. R. Kinkee contributed two pianoforte solos, and accompanied throughout the evening. The choir, conducted by Mr. Joseph Monday, sang glees and part-songs by Bishop, Macfarren, Hatton, and Stewart, and two madrigals "The wintry winds are blowing" (T. Ions) and "My bonnie lass she smileth" (Morley, A.D. 1595).

THE first Concert by the new Brixton Choral Society took place at the Gresham Hall, Brixton, on Thursday, the 20th ult., Van Bree's Cantata "St. Cecilia's Day" being the principal item in the programme. The solo soprano was Miss Annie Mathews. The other portion of the Concert was miscellaneous, and included a new part-song by Mr. Fred. Cozens, entitled "Oh, a calm summer's eve." The concerted pieces were rendered by the choir of nearly 100 members, Miss Annie Mathews, Mr. T. W. Hanson, Mr. W. Sexton, and Mr. Page Hannant contributing songs and ballads. Mr. W. Sexton, of Westminster Abbey, is the Conductor of the Society.

WE are informed that an Association called the Electro-Harmonic Society is being formed, with the object of bringing gentlemen interested in electrical matters together for social and musical enjoyment. It is intended to have, in London, a series of four entertainments this half-year, three of which will be Smoking Concerts, and the remaining one of the series a Concert for both ladies and gentlemen. Application for membership should be made to the Hon. Secretary, H. Alabaster, Esq., Brockenhurst, Therapia Road, Honor Oak, S.E.

MR. H. W. WESTON, F.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster of St. Mary's, Balham, played a short selection of music on St. Stephen's Day, after Evensong, the organ having recently undergone several important alterations and improvements, including a new pedal board, built according to the designs of the College of Organists. Mr. H. W. Weston's selection included, amongst other items, Dr. Pearce's Symphonic Poem "Corde natus esse Parentis," a Pastorale (1st Organ Sonata), by Guilmant, and Best's Fantasy on Christmas Carols.

THE dedication of the new organ and stained glass windows in the spacious Chapel of the Hackney Union, took place on New Year's day. Several of the local clergy were present, and the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Bedford preached the sermon. A contingent from one of the local choirs rendered the special music excellently, and Mr. W. M. Wait (Organist and Choirmaster of St. Andrews, Undershaft, E.C.) presided at the new two-manual instrument, built by Messrs. J. Bishop and Son.

AN Evening Concert was given, on the 14th ult., by Miss Grant, in connection with the Kensington Academy for Girls, when the following artists appeared: Miss Mary Davies, Miss Snowden, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Kate Milner, Messrs. Herbert Nash, Bridson, and Maybrick. Mr. H. C. Tonking performed a violin solo (a Romance in C), accompanied by the composer, Mr. Henry J. Wood; and Miss Ida Audain played two harp solos. Miss Cox presided at the pianoforte.

AT the Examination of Pianoforte Tuners held by the Regent Hall Association at 44, Devonshire Street, Portland Place, on the 12th ult., the following were awarded the Regent Hall Diploma, and were permitted to use the designation "R.H.C.," or Regent Hall Certificate of qualification to practise:—T. Molineux Durrant, of Corporation Street, Birmingham; Edward James Brooking, of Princess Street, Leicester; and Francis J. Moore, of Leicester.

A CONCERT, on behalf of the poor of Chelsea, was given on Tuesday evening, the 18th ult., at the Town Hall, King's Road, under the patronage of H.R.H. Princess Frederica of Hanover. One of the notable items in an excellent programme was the thoroughly artistic performance of Conti di Vinci, whose violin playing in an Elegie by Bazzini, and an obbligato to Braga's favourite Serenata (sung by Mrs. Eustace), was the theme of general admiration. Miss Bessie Waugh presided at the pianoforte.

MR. CHARLES FRY gave a successful Recital of the "Merchant of Venice," at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on the 27th ult., the introduction of Sir Arthur Sullivan's music to the Masque being a special feature of interest. Miss Bessie Waugh and Mr. F. C. Fry were at the piano, and the Serenade was effectively sung by Mr. Edwin Bryant.

WE are informed that Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of Mr. Alfred Allen's patriotic song "London."

On Wednesday, the 12th ult., the Southgate Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Horsly, gave a performance of the "Hymn of Praise." The second part consisted of glees, part-songs, and a miscellaneous selection. The soloists were Mrs. Henry Harrison, Miss Ethel Harrison, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. James Blackney, and the accompanists Miss Rowley and Mr. H. Leipold. Mr. Leipold's playing of a Rhapsody by Liszt was a feature of the evening.

An evening Concert was given, under the direction of Mr. Eade Montefiore, on Tuesday, the 18th ult., at Tattersall's Subscription Room, Albert Gate, when "Blessed are the departed," from Spohr's "Last Judgment," was sung as a tribute to the late Earl of Iddesleigh. Among the artists were Miss Mary Morgan, Miss Seppie Moulton, Mr. John Thomas (harpist to the Queen), Mr. Reginald Groome, Mr. James Blackney, and Mr. H. Knight.

Mr. G. Augustus Holmes gave the third of his series of Organ Recitals at St. George's, Camberwell, on the 16th ult. The programme, which comprised selections from the works of Handel, Batiste, Gounod, Guilmant, Elvey, and Costa, was excellently rendered, and elicited general expressions of approval. These monthly Recitals, which are quite free, are gaining a large share of popularity, as the excellent attendances testify.

On Monday, the 10th ult., a Concert was given at Battersea, by the St. Andrew's Church Choir, the vocalists being Miss Agnes Hardy, Miss Lizzie Collin, Mrs. Foster Pyne, Mr. G. Goodwin, Mr. F. E. Choveaux, and Mr. Louis Gatward. Violin solos were also contributed by Mr. F. J. Dawe, and pianoforte solos and duets by Miss M. Pyne, Miss Hentsch, and Mr. F. E. Choveaux. The choir sang several Christmas carols.

Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter" was given at Lavender Hill, on the 18th ult., by the Stormont Road Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Frank Idle. The soloists were Miss Selina Quick, Miss Emily Dones, and Mr. John Gritton. The second portion of the programme was miscellaneous, and included solos by the vocalists in the Cantata, and by Mr. A. H. Taverner. The accompanists were Miss Louisa Idle and Miss Alice Idle.

On Wednesday, the 5th ult., Mr. F. W. Parker, Organist of Defoe Presbyterian Church, Lower Tooting, was presented by a few friends with a handsome writing-desk, in recognition of his services during the past year. The Rev. W. Anderson, D.D., presided at the meeting held for the purpose in the Lecture Hall, and the presentation was accompanied by a graceful address, on behalf of the donors, by Mr. J. Pirie, M.A., and suitably acknowledged.

The fourth Report of the Popular Ballad Concert Committee shows that much earnest work has been done during the year, but with discouraging financial results. The choir has, however, made steady progress, and it is hoped that an excellent orchestra may eventually be formed. Another appeal for funds is made in the present report, and we sincerely trust that it may prove successful.

An excellent performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given in Westminster Chapel on the 11th ult., the soloists being Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Josephine Cravino, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. R. Hilton. The organ accompaniments were effectively rendered by Mr. Sydney Cross, the newly appointed Organist, and Mr. George Carr ably conducted.

We regret to announce the death of Mr. Thomas Pollard, which took place at Southport on the 13th ult. As an organist, he held a high position, having received several appointments, his first being at the early age of fourteen. At the time of his death he was Organist of the Church of our Lady of St. Hubert's, Great Harwood.

We hear that Mr. Stavenhagen has been engaged by Mr. Arthur Chappell, and will appear at the Popular Concerts later in the season. Mr. Schonberger will, most likely, precede him.

Messrs. Nicholson and Co., of Worcester, are enlarging the organ in St. John's Church, Leicester, and it is to be completed by the 9th inst., when Dr. C. J. Frost, of London, is announced to re-open it.

Mr. H. C. Tonking gave an Organ Recital at St. Saviour's Church, St. George's Square, on Sunday, the 16th ult., after Evensong. The programme included compositions by Bach, Beethoven, Gounod, Costa, and Wély, all of which were listened to with interest by a crowded congregation.

Messrs. George Bell and Sons will shortly issue a small volume upon Musical Analysis, by Mr. Henry C. Banister, comprising the substance of Lectures delivered before the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind. It will be copiously illustrated by examples from the works of the great composers.

"Ruddygore" will be the last opera produced under the arrangement, entered into some years ago, by Sir Arthur Sullivan, Mr. Gilbert, and Mr. D'Oyley Carte. The public trust that the partners will make another contract and start afresh.

Mr. Alfred Physick gave an Organ Recital at Holy Trinity Church, Upper Tooting, on December 29, in aid of the organ fund. The programme consisted of works by Handel, Beethoven, Meyerbeer, Gounod, Wély, E. H. Turpin, and Dr. Frost.

The organ just erected in the Presbyterian Church, Wickham Road, S.E., by Bevington and Sons, of Rose Street, Soho, was formally opened by Dr. Charles Joseph Frost, on Thursday, the 13th ult.

Mr. Randegger, Mr. Tosti, Mr. Sutherland Edwards, Mr. Joseph Bennett, and Mr. Hueffer were among those who left London last week to be present at the first performance of Verdi's "Otello."

We regret to hear that Mr. Carrodus is suffering from indisposition and unable to exercise his profession. His place as "leader" at the London Symphony Concerts has been taken by Mr. Hollander.

His Holiness Pope Leo XIII. has been pleased to confer upon Mr. Charles Santley the rank and title of Knight Commander of the Order of Saint Gregory the Great (K.C.S.G.).

The English version of Verdi's "Otello" will, it is stated, be written by Mr. Hueffer.

REVIEWS.

The History of Music. By Emil Naumann. Translated by F. Praeger. Edited by the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., Mus. Doc., Professor of Music in the University of Oxford. [Cassell and Company, Limited.]

Histories of Music have become so plentiful in the present day that unless some special features of interest characterise an addition to the stock, there can scarcely be a chance of public attention being sufficiently interested to ensure a success which shall repay an author for his labour. Emil Naumann, however, is no ordinary historian; and the result of his indefatigable researches, embodied in the two handsome volumes before us, will most certainly be extensively read, not only as a record of facts, but also on account of the literary merit shown in narrating and commenting upon them. In his Preface the author says: "Notwithstanding all the excellent work published within the last few years, on account of the desire of the ever-increasing number of the serious friends of music for further knowledge of musical history, there was a want felt of a work that would, with pictorial aid, meet that demand. The aid of illustrations of important musical documents, &c., has therefore been called in to render the comprehension of past periods and the ever-changing position of musical art more clear. To effect such a purpose has been the aim of the present work. Neither trouble nor time has been spared in treating this most extensive subject in such a manner that possible omissions through unsuccessful research into important periods might be avoided." We are bound to say that in every respect the avowed purpose of the author has been most satisfactorily carried out, and only regret that our limited space precludes the possibility of doing that justice to the book which it is unquestionably entitled to.

Commencing with a few remarks upon the state of the art in the classical and pre-classical eras, we have a long description of the music of the Chinese, Japanese, and Hindoos, many observations upon the dawn of the art in China having much interest. The oldest musical scale, we are told, consisted of five tones, from F to D, omitting the B. The lowest note of this scale was called "emperor," the second "prime minister," the third "loyal subjects," the fourth "affairs of state," and the fifth "mirror of the world." We can scarcely believe that compositions of any importance would be produced from a limited scale with such absurd names; but it is asserted that "King-Hi, 1680 A.D., invented with success some new melodies, and founded an Academy of Music," so that we may imagine that the enlargement of this scale from five to seven tones produced wonderful results. The whole of the space devoted to the music of the nations already mentioned, as well as that treating of the Egyptians, Ethiopians, and Western Asiatics, abounds in valuable information as to the progress of the art, and also upon the variety of instruments in use, many excellent illustrations bringing them most vividly before us. We cannot but linger over some of the melodies of the Israelites—especially that pathetic strain, "By the waters of Babylon," not only because it is in itself so beautiful, but because we see how it has haunted those modern composers who have set these words to music. There can be no question that, as our author observes, in very many of these airs diminished intervals form a special feature, but it is hazardous to assume that "diminished chords" were freely used in their accompaniments, for, as the editor says in a foot-note, it is questionable whether the scales employed by the ancient Israelites were susceptible of any harmony at all. The music of the Greeks and Romans, Folk-music, and the history of the Troubadours and Minnesingers are treated in a somewhat sketchy style; but it should be recollected that in so elaborate a work it is impossible to write at great length upon each epoch in the gradual development of the art. The growth of Polyphony is well traced; the chapters on the Old French and Netherland Schools contain much interesting matter, and a chapter on "Early English Music," by Sir Frederick Ouseley, is appended. "Luther and the Music of the Protestant Church," "The two Gabrielis, Palestrina, and the Classical Tone-Schools of Italy," "The Tuscan School and the Musical Drama," "Lotti and the Masters of the Catholic Restoration," "Allessandro Scarlatti and the Neapolitan School," "Lully and the old French Opera," and "The Germans in the School of the Italians," are the titles of some of the following chapters. "English music" is then again treated by the editor. Passing rapidly over Music in England during the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary, we come to a chapter on the bright days of Elizabeth, when Church music, Madrigals, and Chamber music were cultivated to such a perfection as to materially raise the status of the art in this country. With an account of the spread of what is termed the "Musical Zopf" (or Decadence) over central Europe, and another chapter by Sir Frederick Ouseley describing the state of music in England until the advent of Handel, the first volume ends.

Bach, Handel, Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven occupy, as may be supposed, a considerable amount of space in the second volume; and although, perhaps, there is little new in any of their biographies, the materials are exceedingly well put together, and the matter is written with an earnestness which shows how thoroughly the author's heart was in his task. With some of the opinions expressed we are not disposed to agree, and here and there the dates given are at variance with those set down by the best authorities, yet a writer is perfectly justified in recording his own convictions; and we have little doubt, from the excessive care obviously bestowed upon the book, that the author has, to his own satisfaction, at least, thoroughly verified his dates. Schubert, Weber, Spohr, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, and Schumann come next in order, and these are termed composers of talent, the former group coming under the denomination of composers of genius. In defence of this, an explanation is given of the words style and manner, with which we cannot say that we coincide. This is no place, however, to discuss the question, and those interested in it must be referred to the book itself. The remarks upon Schumann and Meyerbeer are extremely good; but we think justice is scarcely done to Weber, who was certainly more than "in some respects an innovator" in instrumentation. The Grand Opera of Paris and the French Comic Romantic Opera are then discussed, the influence of Cherubini, Spontini, and Rossini is carefully estimated, and under the heading of the "New Romantic School" we arrive at a consideration of the claims of Hector Berlioz and Richard Wagner; Liszt, as the author tells us, "holding a position midway" between these representative artists. We cannot here examine into the arguments for and against the founders and followers of the "advanced school," but may mention that there are many excellent and well considered observations, especially upon the music of Wagner, of whom Naumann is evidently not a fanatical worshipper. "The Present," the concluding chapter of the work, contains a very fair record of the principal artists of our own time; but let the author speak for himself as to his musical estimate of that "time." "The period of the present," he says, "might with some justice be described as the period of the 'Epigones'—i.e., of those whose works form the art-production of a period of transition alternative with the existence of the great geniuses, and the attempted 'discovery' of others. For example, thirty years ago the author was introduced to a young man as the future Goethe; this man has since become one of the foremost of German poets, but approaches Goethe no more than Chopin does Schumann or Schubert. How often in the space of thirty years do so-called geniuses arise, who after a decade at most are forced back into oblivion." This very decided opinion is somewhat qualified in the succeeding paragraph; but we can scarcely be wrong in thinking that Naumann believes, despite the creations of many talented musicians of the present day, we are merely in an age of transition. In the chapter added by the editor, "Modern English Music," the names of most of the eminent composers of this country receive due honour. It should be said, however, that speaking of Cipriani Potter as Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, we are told "This honourable and useful appointment he held till 1859, when he resigned it in favour of Sterndale Bennett." This is not true. Potter's successor was Charles Lucas, who was Principal of the Academy until 1866, when Sterndale Bennett was elected to the office in association with Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, who was styled Vice-Principal. This error seems the more extraordinary as afterwards it is asserted that Charles Lucas held the appointment from 1859 to 1866.

In the course of our remarks upon this work we have incidentally alluded to the excellent illustrations scattered throughout its pages. Amongst these are not only quaint and authentic portraits of eminent artists, but minutely executed drawings of musical instruments in use at all times, and in all countries, and fac-similes of composers' manuscripts and letters. "It is a pleasant duty," says the author, in his Preface, "to tender thanks to those heads of libraries and institutions who have in manifold ways aided necessary investigations by supplying autographs, photographs, documents, &c."; and this shows the amount of sympathy with the author in his task. For the manner in which the book has been translated by Mr. F. Praeger, every credit is due; and Sir Frederick Ouseley merits warm commendation for his earnest labours as editor. Many of his foot-notes not only call attention to assertions which are scarcely supported by authority, but occasionally supply the omission of names in the list of composers of the period spoken of; and we must also say that his chapters on "English music" fit in exceedingly well with the style of Naumann. We cordially commend these volumes to the attention of students of the art; but most readers will, we think, share our opinion that the author is at his best before he comes to modern times.

Five Songs, from the Works of the English Poets, &c. The music by M. Stydolf. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

Mr. Stydolf, in the group of songs before us, cannot at all events be said to have endeavoured to hit the popular taste. Indeed, he appears to have revelled in the region of chromatic harmonies until he loses himself, as may be seen (to name one example) in the 7th bar of the first song, where, knowing what sounds he wants, he writes E♭ in the voice part and D♯ in the accompaniment. As a specimen of the modern style, where the voice is subordinate to the pianoforte, however, there is much to admire in the opening song, "To an Absentee," the vocal phrases expressing with admirable fidelity Hood's glowing verses. Of the two songs to Byron's words, "To Thyrza" and "There was a time I need not name," we infinitely prefer the latter, although the restlessness of the accompaniment somewhat detracts from the general effect of the composition. The setting of Tennyson's well known "Break, break, break," is more quiet and unobtrusive than we could have expected in so ambitious a collection of vocal pieces; and "The Silent Land" (Salis, paraphrased), although perhaps too heavily harmonised, is wedded to a melody in true sympathy with the words. We accept these songs as a fair sample of the strivings after originality of an undoubtedly clever composer; but the "free" style of writing must have its limits; and if Mr. Stydolf will only write his harmonies according to any defined system, although we may not agree with it, he will at least be able to defend them from the attacks of "purists."

The Flute Player's Journal. First and Second Series.

Romance and Valse Capriccioso for Flute, with accompaniment for Pianoforte. Composed by A. P. Vivian.

Rudall, Carte and Co.'s United Service Military Band Journal.

[Rudall, Carte and Co.]

THE first series of the "Flute Player's Journal" consists of Sonatas and original compositions for the flute and pianoforte. The two numbers sent to us—each containing a Barcarolle, the first by Alfred Cellier, and the second by A. D. Duvivier—are very favourable specimens of music composed for the amateurs of an instrument which we should be glad to see more cultivated in musical society. The second series, devoted to operatic and popular airs, if we may judge from the numbers before us—a Fantasia on themes from Sir Arthur Sullivan's Opera "The Mikado," by W. L. Barrett, and the "Royal Princes' Polka," by Henry Klussmann—may be also strongly recommended as excellent pieces both for practice and performance. Of a higher class of writing is Mr. Vivian's "Romance and Valse Capriccioso," appropriately dedicated to Mr. Oluf Svendsen. The Romance is extremely graceful, and in the melodious Waltz which follows the passages for the flute are effective, and evidently carefully considered by one who thoroughly understands the instrument. The "Military Band Journal" contains a Grand Parade March, "A la Pavane," by Charles Salaman; the Prelude to Mackenzie's Opera "Colomba," and the "Royal Princes' Polka." The band parts are clearly printed.

The Musical Directory, Annual, and Almanack, for 1887. [Rudall, Carte and Co.]

THE thirty-fifth annual issue of this well-planned Directory is in every respect equal to its predecessors. Of course, the perfect accuracy of a work of this kind depends very much upon the reliability and promptitude of the returns made to the publishers; and in proof of the apathy on the part of those applied to, we have here a long list of names which arrived too late for insertion in the body of the book. Every pains, however, seem to have been taken to ensure correctness; and the Directory may be conscientiously recommended as a valuable work of reference.

Studies in Worship Music. By John Spencer Curwen. [J. Curwen and Sons.]

THIS entertaining little volume embodies the results of personal investigation into the highways and byeways of faith, considered strictly in their musical aspects. Commencing with a description of the homes and studies of the choristers of the Chapel Royal, Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's Cathedral, and Lincoln's Inn Chapel, the author goes on to speak of a Welsh Psalmody Festival, the music of the Salvation Army, the Greek and Russian churches in London, the Lutheran church, the Presbyterian church, music in Sunday schools, and many other kindred topics. The President of the Tonic Sol-fa College, knowing the tastes and capabilities of the people, entertains broad views on the subject of religious music. He claims that tunes which musicians would think vulgar and even irreverent may appeal to the uneducated classes more forcibly than the strains of Bach, or even "the warmly coloured modern tunes of Dykes and Barnby." Of course this argument might be carried too far, to the discouragement of all attempts to lead the humbler classes towards the appreciation of better things. Mr. Curwen has no such intention, and his essays may be commended to all who are interested in the subject of church—or, as he terms it, worship—music, as containing much calculated to instruct as well as amuse.

Remember not, Lord, our offences. Anthem. By George J. Halford. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

As a contribution to Lenten music, which will shortly be once more in request, this brief full anthem should receive favourable mention. It is a setting of a clause from the Litany, and though properly severe, it is melodious, and written in a refined and musicianly style. Objection, however, must be taken to the accent on the second syllable of the word "forefathers," especially as it injures the force of the context.

Have mercy upon me. Anthem. By Charles Salaman. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

LAST year Mr. Salaman celebrated his jubilee as a composer, but it may be said of him as of the great lawgiver, that his natural force is not abated. There is certainly no sign of weakness in this charming little anthem. It opens with a flowing and extremely expressive treble solo, which yields to a quartet and finally a chorus, all the sections being in 9-8 measure, and following one another without break. The close is especially beautiful, and a more symmetrical and artistic composition of its kind could not be desired.

Benedicite in A. By S. D. Bird. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IT seems to be regarded as an axiom that chants for the Benedicite should be in triple time. The present setting consists of one double chant, very simple in itself, but a series of varied harmonies and embellishments is provided, which, without being ornate, would be effective if played with taste.

Musical Dominoes, suited to all ages. Combining Musical Tuition with Amusement, and insuring a Progressive Knowledge of Time, Reading, &c. [A. A. Akerman.]

WE have copied the whole of the title printed upon this box of "Musical Dominoes" because it effectually describes the aim of the ingenious inventor of the game. Having often before given our opinion of the value of such aids to the acquisition of sound musical knowledge, we have only here to say that an examination of these Dominoes, with the rules to be observed in playing, has in no respect altered our previous convictions on the subject. The relative value of notes, rests, and the manner in which bars are made up, can only be legitimately studied on music paper; but those who believe that instruction of any value can be thus combined with amusement will find this game admirably suited for the purpose.

Albums for Violin and Pianoforte. No. 5. Twelve Sketches. By Battison Haynes. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE have on more than one occasion drawn attention to the great talent evinced by Mr. Battison Haynes in compositions for the organ, and it is pleasing to find that in another branch of musical work he is equally at home. Perhaps the most noteworthy feature in these pieces is their variety. Among them are a march, a cradle song, a mazurka, a polonaise, and a moto perpetuo, each utterly unlike the others not only in measure, but in general character. It should be mentioned that they are duets, not violin solos with pianoforte accompaniment. Players desirous of music combining effect with comparative simplicity cannot fail to be pleased with this Album.

Missa de Sancto Amphibalo. By B. Agutter, Mus. Bac. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this Communion Service may be credited with possessing more than ordinary desire that all things should be done decently and in order. He writes a preface in which he advocates the restoration of the Kyrie proper, and dwells upon points which composers often stumble over whose musicianship is superior to their knowledge of church history and tradition. In this he follows the example se by other writers lately, notably Mr. Gerard Cobb. We have spoken favourably of Mr. Agutter's church music on severaloccasions, and the present service demands at least equal commendation. The endeavour throughout has evidently been to illustrate the meaning of the words as clearly as possible without sacrificing simplicity, and this is a point that will tell in favour of the composition with the clergy and precentors.

Jubilee March. Primroses, Gavotte. Composed by John Wrigley. [Forsyth Brothers.]

The name of his composer has already come before us; and allied, if we mistake not, with a work of classical form. The pianoforte pieces now submitted for notice, although appealing to the popular taste, are deserving of much praise; the first—an excellent specimen of a jubilant March—seeming to require the resources of a military band for its due effect. The Gavotte, in A minor, is melodious, well harmonised, and thoroughly worth the attention of the many who afect this style of music in the present day.

When the ungodly; Try me, O God. Anthems. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]
I am the Lord. Anthem. [Weekes and Co.]
Composed by John Heywood.

There is evidence of talent in these compositions, although they are not entirely free from a suspicion of crudeness. The actual grammatical errors are very few, but the writing is sometimes vague and inconsequent, particularly in the solos, which, by the way, are too numerous. The choruses are better, that in the first anthem being an admirable little piece of church music, not unlike the chaste and dignified compositions of Goss. Mr. Heywood is not always happy in his treatment of the words. The reiteration of such a sentence as "I will sup with him, and he shall sup with Me," in the third anthem, has an unintentionally ludicrous effect. We have spoken candidly, as the composer has ability and will probably do better with experience.

Six Caractéristiques, for the Pianoforte.
Novelette, for the Pianoforte.
Twilight Music. Song. Words by Margaret Elenora Tupper. Composed by Richard Rickard. [E. H. Heinke, Holborn Viaduct.]

In all Mr. Rickard's music we see a very decided feeling for melody, and a refinement of treatment which cannot fail to win the attention both of musical and unmusical listeners. The six pianoforte pieces (strangely enough termed "Caractéristiques") are well written and unaffected Sketches which pianists will thank us for calling attention to. From the half-dozen, we may select for especial praise No. 3, "Caprice"; No. 5, "Norwegian Danse"; and No. 6, "Polish Danse," the two last-named being full of character. No. 1, "Coquette," will also, no doubt, be a decided favourite with young players who are looking out for an attractive, and not too difficult, piece for the approaching festive season. The "Novelette" is a spirited and effective Allegro, in G, written throughout with an evident knowledge of the instrument, and sufficiently varied to interest all hearers. The Song is scarcely so much to our mind, the moving chromatic accompaniment against the voice-part containing many harsh intervals which, in a second edition, we think it would be well to re-consider.

Year after Year. Song. Words by the author of John Halifax.
I love thee. Song. Words by Tom Hood. Composed by Frederic H. Cowen. [E. Ascherberg and Co.]

Even the simple songs of Mr. Cowen are so attractive to musical ears, from their artistic treatment, that they are always received with a cordial welcome. Of the two now before us we infinitely prefer the first, which has all the elements of popularity, both from the melodiousness of the theme, and the charmingly sympathetic manner in which it is accompanied. "I love thee," although flowing spontaneously from a study of Hood's musical verses, is scarcely, we think, as successful as the preceding song. One great merit, however, in all the vocal pieces of this composer, is that he never unduly displays his knowledge at the expense of the music, a reticence not always characterising the smaller works of accomplished artists like Mr. Cowen.

The Iron Horse. Chorus for S.A.T.B. Words by J. Lewton Brain.
Off to Sea. Part-song for Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass. Poetry by Edward Oxenford.
Composed by W. W. Pearson.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. Pearson has already earned much fame as a writer of Part-songs, and certainly those before us are fully worthy of his reputation. Of the two, we prefer "The Iron Horse," which is bold, effective, and happily descriptive of the words. "Off to sea," with its inevitable "Yeave ho," is somewhat more conventional; but it is a good song, and will no doubt find favour with choral societies in search of novelty.

FOREIGN NOTES.

As had been foreshadowed in the leading article on the subject, published in our last number, the Eutin celebration of the centenary of the birth of Carl Maria von Weber, has been of an "almost purely local" character. The following is an extract from an account of the festivities, contained in the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung: "From an early hour in the morning the streets of Eutin were crowded with spectators eager to inspect the decorations with which the whole town was ablaze. At eleven o'clock there was a festive gathering at Köpke's Hôtel, where the world-famed 'Oberon' Overture ushered in an appropriate prologue (from the pen of Dr. Gesky) spoken by one of the senior scholars of the Eutin Grammar School, which was followed by an able oration, delivered by Dr. Bader, wherein the merits of Weber, as a specifically German composer, were discussed at length. The musical programme of this early gathering was completed with the performance, by the Eutin Gesangverein, of Weber's setting of Körner's poem, 'Hör uns Allmächtiger,' and a rendering of the 'Preciosa' Overture. The assembled members of the municipality and their guests then proceeded to the house where the composer of 'Der Freischütz' first saw the light, and where, thirty-three years ago, a brass tablet, commemorating the fact, had been affixed, which latter was then gaily decorated with flowers and evergreens. The festivities culminated in the performance of the music of the immortal 'Freischütz,' in which the parts of Max and of the Hermit were executed by artists from the Lubeck opera, the remaining parts being well-sustained by local amateurs. Herr Heinsen, the Eutin organist, conducted. A festive banquet concluded the proceedings." These, then, are the moderate proportions which the long-anticipated festivities have assumed in his native town, in honour of the centenary of the birth of "the most truly German musician that ever lived," and which, from their very insignificance, deserve a record in these columns. Creditable enough though they were to the miniature town in Holstein, with its exceedingly scanty resources, from a national point of view, they were a distinct failure. We add the following to the number of Weber celebrations already recorded:—At Cassel (Hof-Theater), "Euryanthe," and the Cantata "Kampf und Sieg"; at Quedlinburg (Kohlscher Gesangverein), music to "Der Freischütz"; at Diedenhofen, in Alsace (Stadt-Theater), scenes from "Freischütz," "Preciosa," and "Silvana," Overture "Oberon"; at Znaym (Austria), "Jubel" Overture, Concertstück in F minor, Polonaise, arranged for orchestra by Liszt, male quartets, and numbers from "Preciosa" and "Der Freischütz"; at Barmen (Stadt-Theater), "Euryanthe"; at Lubeck (Philharmonic Society), Overtures "Ruler of the Spirits" and "Euryanthe"; at Leipzig (Stadt-Theater), cyclus of operas, from "Silvana" to "Oberon."

The sum of one thousand marks (not ten thousand, as our Belgian contemporary, Le Guide Musical, munificently announces) has lately been added to the Weber Monument Fund by his majesty the Emperor of Russia.

A correspondent writes to us from Darmstadt: "In commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of Weber's birth, a tablet bearing an appropriate inscription has been placed against the house, 'Kleine Ochsengasse, No. 14,' in which the master resided during the years 1810 and 1811, while still a pupil of Abbé Vogler. It was here, also, that the charming operetta 'Abu Hassan' was written, the score of which, in Weber's own handwriting, is preserved in the grand ducal archives."

The copyright which hitherto protected the compositions of Robert Schumann expired on the 1st ult., and a number of new editions of the works of that master are now being issued by German firms.

Herr P. Rüfer's "Merlin" (not to be confounded with Herr Goldmark's opera of the same title recently produced at Vienna) is to be brought out at the Berlin Opera House during the present month, under the direction of Capellmeister Radecke.

At a sale of autographs recently held at Berlin, the following interesting numbers were included, viz.:—An unpublished composition by Richard Wagner (price realised, 960 marks); two Polonaises by Chopin (400 marks); a letter by Beethoven, dated Vienna, September 29, 1816 (200 marks); a letter by Haydn, dated Esteras, October 10, 1785 (225 marks); four Marches for pianoforte, by Robert Schumann (100 marks); a manuscript, by J. S. Bach (936 marks); and an Aria for soprano, "Conservati fedele," by Mozart, with accompaniment of two violins, alto, and bass (119 marks). The last-named composition, being dated 1765, must have been written when the composer was only nine years of age.

Mr. Frederick Lamond, the gifted young Scottish pianist, at present engaged upon a continental concert-tour, has recently given some highly successful performances at the Saxon capital, which are most favourably commented on in the local journals; the Dresdener Nachrichten more especially paying a high tribute of admiration to the genius and exceptional attainments of the young artist.

Miss Amy Hare, the young English pianist, has met with a most favourable reception at recent concert performances in Germany, notably at Bonn and Cologne. Miss Hare owes her musical education entirely to this country, she having been a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music.

During a recent performance, at Barmen, of Wagner's "Rienzi," the well-known Munich tenor, Herr Vogl, was accidentally wounded by the dagger of his colleague representing the part of Orsini. The redoubtable Wagner-tenor, however, notwithstanding a considerable loss of blood, continued his performance to the end. The wound, we may add, has fortunately not proved a very serious one.

The Official Gazette of Berlin anounces the appointment of Herr Johannes Brahms as a Knight of the Order "Pour le Mérite," in company with the eminent historians Professor Treitschke and Dr. Gustav Freytag. The German Emperor has also appointed Signor Giuseppe Verdi a foreign Knight of the same order.

A new opera by Herr Edmund Kretschmer, entitled "Schön Rothtraut," has been accepted for performance at the Court Theatres of Dresden and Munich.

Under the title of "Schumann's Klavier-Tonpoesie" an interesting analysis of the pianoforte compositions of Robert Schumann, from the pen of Herr Bernhard Vogel, has just been published in Leipzig.

At the Imperial Opera of Vienna, M. Camille Saint-Saëns's "Dalila," and the maëstro Samara's successful opera "Flora Mirabilis," will shortly be produced as the principal novelties of the season.

Herr Ludwig Deppe, the well-known German chef-d'orchestre, has been appointed one of the musical directors of the Royal Opera of Berlin.

A "Beethoven Museum" is to be instituted at Heiligenstadt, near Vienna, which, in addition to a library, a collection of manuscripts, &c., is to contain works of art and other objects having reference to the great master.

With reference to the forthcoming première of Verdi's already so much talked-of opera "Otello," a correspondent writes to the Daily News:—"The one theme in Milan for the moment is Verdi's new opera, which will be produced, it is expected, in the first days of February. The new opera consists of four acts, which are none of them long. The scene is laid partly in Venice, partly in Candia. The overture, says a Milan correspondent, is a tempestuous poem, and the love-songs are magnificent. A serenade in the opening scene is to be accompanied by four rows of old Italian guitars, which have not catgut but metal strings; this composition is deliciously new and charming. Many distinguished persons are expected in Milan at the beginning of February for the début; the Comte de Paris, Madame Adam, M. Clémenceau, the millionaire, Dreyfus, the directors of the Grand Opéra of Paris, who have already taken their places, and many others." The same journal writes "The fact that Verdi's birthday is wrongly given by all his biographers (including the writer in Sir George Grove's dictionary only a few months ago) was discovered by an English musical critic some years since. M. Arthur Pougin (the distinguished Parisian critic and author of a biography of the veteran composer) sets the question entirely at rest by printing in facsimile the certificate of Verdi's birth at Le Roncole, October 10, 1813."

A grand Liszt commemoration is being organised at Rome, at the instance of the Princess Wittgenstein, the testamentary executrix of the master. Among the works to be performed on this occasion is said to be a hitherto unknown Mass, which Liszt dedicated to the unfortunate Emperor Maximilian of Mexico.

A collection of Rossini's letters is shortly to be published under the auspices of the Academy of Saint Cecilia of Rome.

Dr. W. Langhans, of Berlin, who is just now visiting Italy, has recently delivered a lecture in the Italian language on "Richard Wagner," at one of the public meetings of the Royal Academy of Music at Florence, which met with a highly favourable reception. Speaking of Turin (in a letter addressed to the writer) the doctor says, inter alia:—"Here I made the acquaintance of a truly gifted young maëstro, Signor A. Catalani, the composer of the opera 'Edmea'—a musician who, in my opinion, has a distinguished career before him." We have already referred to Signor Catalani's opera in last month's "Notes."

Thirty-nine new operas and operettas by native composers have been produced at Italian theatres during the past year.

The following have been the programmes at the leading Concert institutions of Paris during the past month, viz.:—Conservatoire (January 9): Overture, "Leonore" (Beethoven); Gloria Patri (Palestrina); Symphony, C minor (Saint-Saëns); chorus, "Les Bohémiens" (Schumann); Symphony (Haydn); chorus, "Près du fleuve étranger" (Gounod). Châtelet (January 9): Overture, "Dimitri Donskoï" (Rubinstein); Pastoral Symphony (Beethoven); Mouvement perpétuel (Paganini); Overture, "Struensee" (Meyerbeer). Lamoureux Concerts (January 9): Overture, "Flying Dutchman" (Wagner); Symphony in A (Beethoven); Adagio for violoncello (Bargiel); Symphonie Fantastique (Berlioz); "España" (E. Chabrier). Châtelet (January 16): Symphonie Romantique (Joncières); Violin Concerto in A minor (Viotti); Romance for violin (Bruch); Sarabande et Bourrée (Bach); solo violinist, Dr. Joachim. Lamoureux Concerts (January 16): Overture, "Euryanthe" (Weber); Overture, "Coriolanus" (Beethoven); Concerto for two hautbois and string orchestra (Handel). Conservatoire (January 23): Symphony in A (Beethoven); "Hear my Prayer" (Mendelssohn); Concerto for orchestra (Handel); "Kol Nidrei" (Bruch); Finale, first act "Euryanthe" (Weber); Overture, "Tannhäuser" (Wagner). Châtelet (January 23): Symphony, C minor (Beethoven); Violin Concerto (Spohr); Le Rouet d'Omphale (Saint-Saëns); Violin Fantasia (Schumann); Hungarian Dances (Brahms-Joachim); Overture "Benvenuto Cellini" (Berlioz); solo violinist, Dr. Joachim. Lamoureux Concerts (January 23): Concerto in B (Handel); Prelude, and fragments from first act "Die Walküre" (Wagner); Overture "Euryanthe" (Weber). The reappearance at the Châtelet Concerts last month of Dr. Joachim created the most extraordinary enthusiasm, the large theatre having been crowded and the artist being recalled to the platform again and again, many of those present standing up and waving their handkerchiefs. A Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph writes under date 23rd ult., with reference to the great violinist's present visit to the French capital: "Herr Joachim has actually ventured to bring from Berlin the members of his famous quartet party, and to give three séances in this city where so little first-class chamber music is to be heard. Moreover, his programmes are as uncompromisingly severe in Paris as in Berlin. They consist of three quartets unrelieved by anything else. The programme of the first Concert consisted of Schumann's Quartet in A minor, Mozart's in C major, and Beethoven's marvellous work in C sharp minor. Herr Joachim's companions are Herren de Ahna, Wirth, and Haussmann, and the four performed with an ensemble such as I have never heard in Paris for very many years. Erard's Concert-room was well filled on the occasion of the first Concert, although the price of admission was twenty francs."

At the Paris Grand Opéra, M. Paladilhe's new opera "Patrie" continues to be favourably received, and is likely to remain on the répertoire for some time to come. At the Eden Theatre, the rehearsals are about to commence of Wagner's "Lohengrin," under the direction of M. Lamoureux, who has engaged an orchestra of ninety performers and a chorus of some eighty members for this purpose.

M. Ambroise Thomas is engaged upon the composition of an opera, "Circe," the libretto by Jules Barbier, which is to be first brought out at the Opéra Comique.

A correspondent writes to the Wiener Musikalische Zeitung from the Hague: "In consequence of the withdrawal of M. Verhulst from the direction of the 'Diligentia' Society, the works of Liszt have at last gained admittance here, and the performance at the first Concert of the season of 'Les Préludes' was a veritable triumph for the new Conductor, M. Richard Hol, who was recalled to the platform—a most unusual occurrence here. The programme of the second Concert included, with Brahms's second Symphony and Weber's 'Euryanthe' Overture, Wagner's 'Faust' Symphony, and thus the veto hitherto placed, with a determination worthy of a better cause, by the former Conductor upon all works emanating from the august Triad, Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner, would seem to have been effectually removed."

Anton Rubinstein has been elected an associate member of the Royal Academy of Brussels, in the room of the late Franz Liszt.

Wagner's "Die Walküre" is to be produced, for the first time, this month at the Théâtre de la Monnaie of Brussels, in the French language.

Abraham van Lier, who for the last thirty-five years had been the highly esteemed Director of the Stadt-Theater of Amsterdam, died at that town at the age of seventy-four.

At Vesoul died Giuseppe Fauconnet, the Nestor of pianoforte tuners, who could boast of having been employed in that capacity by Beethoven, and subsequently also by Rossini and Meyerbeer.

The death is announced, on December 19, at Hâvre, of Andreas Oechsner, a musician much esteemed in the French town just named (where he founded the Société Sainte Cecile), and a meritorious composer of choral and orchestral music. Oechsner was a native of Germany, he having been born at Mayence in 1815.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MUSICAL PROGRESS IN THE UNITED STATES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The progress of music in America during the past twenty years has been quite remarkable, and has fully kept pace with the developments and inventions of other arts and sciences, so far at least as bringing before the people the works of the composers of other countries. It must be confessed, however, that with all our conservatories for teaching the art in all its branches, we can point to but few persons—not more than two or three at most—who have developed any special gift as composers, and even a less number who have attained to any eminence as vocalists. As a matter of fact, those who have obtained any name owe their successes to private teaching, to instruction in the smaller music schools, or to that gained abroad. We have in this country many successful instructors, and also too many cheap Mus. Docs. and Professors, who have assumed those titles without any authority other than being the recipients of a parchment with a big red seal from some institution (?) where there is no professorship in that branch, and where, provided this professorship did exist, the person so honoured could not pass an examination entitling him to such a degree. But all this will be changed. We are a people of progress and real progress will be ours, in this as in other things. The days of the musical conventions, the chief object of which was some new tune-book made for the occasion by the conductor to sell to the members, have long since been numbered, and in their place we now have works of standard value, oratorios, &c. This is certainly progress.

Twenty years ago there was little outside of Boston except a series of Symphony Concerts, with a big orchestra in New York. Now we find choral societies scattered throughout the Eastern, Northern, and Western States, with one large inland city, Cincinnati, striving for that supremacy which Boston has long been fully entitled to through her Handel and Haydn Society, from whose influence all others have sprung. Twice within the period mentioned has our old Handel and Haydn Society visited New York on missionary business, and at length our neighbours of the great metropolis were induced to form a choral society for oratorios and other standard works of magnitude. Boston still maintains the proud distinction of pre-eminence when we consider the splendid series of Symphony Concerts with which we are favoured through the liberality of one of her wealthy citizens, her numerous singing clubs, and her Oratorio Society. New York is, however, to be credited with the establishment of the American Opera, so organized that many other large cities are equally interested in its stability; and now in its second season it may be pronounced an emphatic success.

Our musical season here in Boston is just now coming into the full tide of Oratorio, Symphony, Club Concerts and Operatic performances with every appearance of success for all.

CONCONE'S VOCAL LESSONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I see in your reviewing columns of this month a notice of Signor Randegger's new edition of Concone's Vocal Lessons. In explaining how the editor says they should be sung, your reviewer quotes from the book for contralto, and the one for bass or baritone, only. In the preface to the "Fifty Exercises for the Medium Part of the Voice" it is stated that all are intended to be vocalised, thus showing that these exercises are not intended to be sung in the same manner as those of the other two books.

Yours very truly,

January 7, 1887. A TEACHER OF SINGING.

[Our assertion that twenty-five of the Exercises are to be sung as Solfeggi, and fifteen vocalised, sufficiently proves, as our correspondent says, that we referred to the volumes containing forty lessons. The fifty for the Medium Part of the Voice are all to be vocalised—The Writer of the Review.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERFELDY, N.B.—A short Organ Recital was given by Mr. Jesse Timson (Organist and Choirmaster to Sir Robert Menzies, Bart.), on Sunday, December 26—after the usual evening service—at St. David's, Weem (Episcopal). The choir also sang a number of Christmas Carols. There was a good congregation.——The Aberfeldy Choral Union gave a performance of Handel's Messiah, on Tuesday, December 28, under the direction of Mr. Jesse Timson. The soloists, who were all members of the Society, were extremely successful, and the chorus singing was highly creditable.

ABERGAVENNY.—The Choral Society gave the first Concert for the season at the Town Hall, on the 20th ult., when Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's May Queen formed the first part. The soloists were Mrs. Pegler, Miss Augusta Morgan, Mr. E. Kemp, and Mr. Alfred Lord. The choir numbered upwards of fifty voices, and the accompaniments were played by the Abergavenny Orchestral Band, assisted by some members of the Birmingham Orchestra. The second part was miscellaneous, and included solos by the above-named artists and instrumental selections by Messrs. T. and P. Watkis. Mr. Throne Biggs conducted.

BARNET.—On Friday evening, the 21st ult., Mr. Francis Gregg gave his fourth annual benefit Concert in the Town Hall. The programme opened with a Trio by Gurlitt, for pianoforte, Mr. F. Gregg; violin, Miss Blanche Perman; and violoncello, Miss Mabel Chaplin. The principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Hay, Miss Marion Galton, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. Albert Tarling, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. Instrumental solos were also contributed by Miss Perman (violin), Miss Chaplin (violoncello), and the Concert-giver (pianoforte). A word of praise must not be omitted for the thoroughly capable and musicianly accompaniments of Mr. A. Hadrill.

BELFAST.—The performance of Handel's Messiah, by the Philharmonic Society, on December 23, at the Ulster Hall, was attended by a crowded audience. Madame de Fonblanque in "Rejoice greatly," Miss Damian in "He was despised," Mr. Bernard Lane in "Comfort ye," and Mr. Gilbert Campbell in "Why do the nations" were especially successful; and the choruses—notably "For unto us a child is born," and the "Hallelujah"—were finely sung, a result which must have been highly gratifying to Herr Beyschlag, who conducted in a masterly manner throughout. Mr. Edgar Haines led the orchestra, and the organ accompaniments were played with much discretion by Mr. Shillington.

BOLTON.—On the evening of December 29 the Choral Society occupied the Albert Hall, Town Hall, at an "open" meeting, and gave, in the most acceptable manner and before a large audience, The Golden Legend (Sullivan) and the first part of Elijah.——The same Society appeared again on the 22nd ult., at one of the series of "Concerts for the People," and repeated The Golden Legend. The principals on both occasions were Mrs. Mantell, Miss Haslam, Mr. J. Binns, and Mr. J. Warburton. Mr. J. W. Appleyard conducted.——On the 8th ult. the Eagley Choral Society rendered, in the Town Hall, The Ancient Mariner, under the direction of Mr. H. Greg. Miss Gertrude Kay, of the Royal College of Music, undertook the soprano part at short notice.——Popular Concerts will be given in the Temperance Hall at intervals.

BRADFORD.—The fine four-manual organ in St. Mark's Church was formally re-opened, after extensive alterations and repairs, on the 18th ult., by Mr. J. H. Rooks, Organist of St. Paul's Church, Birmingham, who played selections by Bach, Sullivan, Mendelssohn, Hiles, Handel, Lemmens, and Gounod. The Recital was interspersed with vocal solos, well rendered by Miss Groveham and Messrs. Younghusband and Holdsworth. The organ contains fifty-eight stops, and is blown by hydraulic power.

BROCKLEY.—On the 13th ult., the organ, newly erected in the Presbyterian Church by Bevington and Sons, was formally opened by Dr. C. J. Frost, F.C.O., who gave a Recital of works by Mendelssohn, Chipp, Morandi, and Smart; also his own arrangement, with variations, of "Hark the herald angels sing," which was much appreciated. The Recital was interspersed with solos by Madame Ellen Horne, who sang "Jerusalem" (St. Paul), and "From mighty Kings" (Judas Maccabæus), the latter being encored. The Church choir rendered several choruses, including "Hallelujah" (Mount of Olives), and "All men, all things" (Hymn of Praise). Mr. W. C. Pellett, the Precentor, conducted, and Miss Edith E. Edwards, the Organist of the Church, accompanied.

BROUGHTON-IN-FURNESS.—A Concert was given on December 30, Corder's Cantata The Bridal of Triermain forming the first part of the programme. The difficulties this composition presents to a small choral society are very considerable, and the members are to be congratulated upon the performance. The female chorus won a well-merited encore. The principal vocalists were Miss Dykes, Miss Woodburn, Mr. T. Buckland, and Mr. A. Brown. The second part consisted of songs and part-songs. M. Lexheime was leader of the band, Miss Frearson an able accompanist, and Mr. G. H. Parkinson conducted.

BURNLEY.—The Dettingen Te Deum was rendered by an augmented choir at Brunswick Chapel on the 16th ult., the soloists being Mrs. Horner, and Messrs. Burrell and Pollard. Mr. Massey's choir resumed rehearsals on the 10th ult., with Sullivan's Golden Legend.

CLIFTON.—On the 19th ult., Mr. Ralph Livings gave a Concert at No. 8, Royal Crescent. Mr. Livings, who has studied the pianoforte at the Munich and Leipzig Conservatories, could not have chosen a programme more admirably suited to display his exceptional gifts and cultivated executive powers, the selection including a Prelude and Fugue (Mendelssohn), a Scherzo (Chopin), a Minuet for left hand (Rheinberger), a "Spinnerlied" (Wagner-Liszt), a Berceuse (Grieg), a Tarantelle (Moszkowski), and a Study (Chopin). All these solos were played with a delicacy of touch, a warmth of expression, and a perfection of technique which elicited most enthusiastic marks of approbation, and stamped him as one of the most promising young artists of the day. He was also associated with Mr. T. Carrington (violin) in two Sonatas—Beethoven's in G (No. 8) and Grieg's in F—both of which were finely rendered. Miss Rosalind F. Ellicott's songs were excellently sung and highly appreciated, as were also those of Miss Hilda Wilson and Mr. Lawford Huxtable. Mr. F. Rootham was an able accompanist.

DUNSTER.—On the 14th ult., Mr. J. Warriner, L.Mus., T.C.L., gave an Organ Recital in the Assembly Room of the Luttrell Arms Hotel. The programme was highly attractive, and included, amongst many other interesting items, Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, a Fugue in G minor by Bach, and Mendelssohn's Organ Sonata (No. 3) in A, all of which were excellently rendered and listened to with much attention.

EASTBOURNE.—On Christmas Day the services at All Souls' Church were of a highly attractive character. The ordinary morning service was held at 11 o'clock, appropriate hymns, &c., being very well sung, and there was also a service of Christmas music at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, when an excellent selection was finely rendered. For the first time in Eastbourne a band was introduced into the church service, and was heard with most telling effect in the "Hallelujah Chorus." The whole of the music was under the direction and superintendence of Mr. Henry Baillie, the Organist and Choirmaster.——The second of Mr. Julian Adams's Winter Concerts was given at the Town Hall, on December 29, before a large audience. There was no orchestra on this occasion, but the band of the 2nd Sussex Artillery Volunteers played several attractive selections, under the leadership of Mr. Gritton. The vocalists were Miss Clara Perry, Miss Meredyth Elliott, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Walter Clifford, and the solo instrumentalists, Miss Florence Waud (pianoforte), Mr. Bernhard Carrodus (violin), Mr. Julian Adams (concertina), and Mr. J. Carrodus, jun. (violoncello and accompanist). Mr. Adams (so well known as a pianist and conductor) displayed unexpected proficiency on the concertina, Mr. Bernhard Carrodus created a marked effect in the Andante and Finale of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and Miss Waud's pianoforte playing was much admired.——Mr. Henry Baillie, Organist and Choirmaster of All Souls' Church, gave two Organ Recitals in the above Church, on Thursday, the 20th ult. The programme included Organ Sonata in D major, No. 5 (Mendelssohn); Fugue in E flat, "St. Ann's" (Bach); and selections from Frezer, Handel, Faure, Kalkbrenner, &c.

ENNISKILLEN.—A Concert was given at Tamlaght on the 21st ult. The programme included Spohr's Barcarolle, and Schubert's Sonata (No. 3) for violin and pianoforte, excellently rendered by Mr. Arnold and his son; pianoforte solos by Lady Corry, and songs by Miss Porter and Miss Tottenham; glees were also sung by Messrs. H. Benson, S. Gunning, Major Michaelson, and Mercer; Mrs. Michaelson and Mr. Arnold accompanied on the pianoforte.

GLOUCESTER.—The historical Pianoforte Recital given at the Spread Eagle Assembly Room, on the 11th ult., by Mr. Ralph Livings, attracted a thoroughly appreciative audience, although the attendance was scarcely as numerous as might have been expected, considering that it was the accomplished young pianist's farewell to his native city. The artist's powers were severely tested by a programme which embraced selections from the great masters of the last and present century. Bach's "Chromatic Fantasia," Scarlatti's "Pastorale," arranged by Tausig; Mozart's Rondo in A minor, Beethoven's "Rondo à Capriccio," Gluck's Gavotte in A major (Brahms's arrangement), Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, and several pieces by Chopin, Liszt, Henselt, Raff, &c., were included in the selection, every item being rendered by Mr. Livings not only with technical perfection, but with a conception of the true meaning of each work, which won for him the admiration of all true art-lovers.

GROSBY, LINCOLNSHIRE.—Mr. J. Bennard, R.A.M., gave an evening Concert, on the 7th ult., assisted by Miss Vinnie Beaumont and Miss L. Salusbury Vyvyan, vocalists; Mr. J. D'Aulby, R.A.M., solo pianist; and Mr. C. Cray, accompanist.

HANLEY.—Handel's Messiah was given by the Philharmonic Society, in the Imperial Hall, on the 6th ult.; principal vocalists, Miss Marriott, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. H. Piercy, and Mr. Watkin Mills; leader of the band, Mr. F. Ward; trumpet, Mr. Sourbutts. The choruses were well rendered, and evidenced an improvement in the Society which is highly creditable to the Conductor, Mr. F. Mountford, who occupied his usual position upon the occasion.

HAWICK.—A performance of The Messiah was given in the Exchange Hall, on December 27, under the auspices of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the band and chorus numbering 200 performers. The principal vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Marshall Ward, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. Frank May; Miss Williams in "I know that my Redeemer liveth," Mr. Chilley in "Thou shalt break them," and Mr. May in "The trumpet shall sound," being especially worthy of praise. The choir, which has been considerably augmented, gave the whole of the choruses with fine effect, "For unto us a Child is born," "All we like sheep," and the final "Amen" more particularly; and an efficient orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. H. Dambmann, rendered the Overture, the Pastoral Symphony, and the whole of the accompaniments with much care. The work was conducted by Mr. Fiddes Wilson, and Mr. Charles Bradley (of Edinburgh) presided at the organ.

LEDBURY.—Mr. R. W. Lewis, of Trinity College, London, gave his annual Pianoforte Recital at the Assembly Room, on the 3rd ult., when he rendered, in a masterly manner, selections from Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Raff, Heller, Liszt, &c. Mr. Lewis was ably assisted by Miss Helen Killik, who achieved a marked success in all her songs.

LOUGHBOROUGH.—The fifty-eighth annual Concert took place in the Baxter Gate Chapel on Christmas Day. A selection of choruses from the works of Handel, Haydn, Rossini, and Pergolesi were performed by a band and chorus, under the direction of Mr. George Adcock. The soloists were Madame Clara Gardiner, Miss Maude Harding, R.A.M., and Mr. Wood, all of whom were highly successful.

MARKET RASEN.—Handel's Messiah was given by the members of the Choral Society, on the 6th ult., under the direction of Mr. Helmsley.

The soloists were Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Miss Cowlam, Mr. Sedgwick, and Mr. King. Miss Beaumont won golden opinions by her excellent singing of the soprano airs, and Miss Cowlam was highly effective in the contralto music. The Oratorio was well rendered, both chorus and band being very good.

Masham.—The Musical Society gave a performance of selections from Handel's Oratorio Messiah, on Wednesday evening, the 12th ult. The principal parts were taken by Miss Fannie Sellers, Mrs. Kruckenberg, Rev. Alfred Clarke, and Mr. H. Leathley, whose renderings of the recitatives and solos were very effective; especially Miss F. Sellers, in "Rejoice greatly," "Come unto Him," and "I know that my Redeemer liveth"; and Mrs. Kruckenberg in "He shall feed His flock" and "He was despised." The Rev. A. Clarke's effective singing of "Comfort ye," "Ev'ry valley," and "Behold, and see"; and Mr. Leathley's recitative "For, behold darkness," and the air, "The people that walked in darkness," were everything that could be desired. The choruses were very well performed by the members of the Society, and reflected much credit upon the careful training of the Conductor, Mr. Watson, who accompanied on the pianoforte.

Milnthorpe, Westmoreland.—The Members of the Choral Society gave their first Concert of the present season on Thursday evening, the 20th ult. The first part consisted of Fox's Cantata, The Jackdaw of Rheims, which was rendered in a highly satisfactory manner, both soloists and chorus acquitting themselves well. The second part was miscellaneous, the special feature being the singing of two songs by Miss Phœbe Boulton, who possesses a rich contralto voice, which she uses with good effect. Glees were well sung by the Society, especially Webbe's "When winds breathe soft." Dr. Irvin played the violin obbligato to two songs (sung by Mrs. Law and Mr. Dewberry), and contributed a solo in good style. Mr. Rheam ably fulfilled the duties of accompanist.

Montreal, Canada.—Dvorák's Spectre's Bride, produced for the first time in Canada by the Montreal Philharmonic Society, has made a most favourable impression. The soloists were Miss L. Pyk, Mr. Jules Jordan, and Mr. George Preher, the choir consisting of nearly three hundred voices, supported by an excellent orchestra of forty-five performers. The music-appreciating portion of Montreal unquestionably regard this Concert as one of the most important ever given in Canada. The Society on the second evening performed with much success Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream music, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony (first time in Canada), Spohr's Hymn to St. Cecilia, and Macfarren's May Day—all works too well known to require any comment.

Moreton-in-Marsh.—On Monday, the 3rd ult., Mr. H. C. Tonking gave two Organ Recitals upon the new organ erected by James Connacher and Sons, of Huddersfield. Mr. Tonking's programme included compositions by Handel, Batiste, Steggall, J. S. Bach, Smart, Gounod, Costa, Widor, and others. There was a large and attentive audience.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne.—Dr. Rea gave his Christmas performance of The Messiah in the Town Hall, on Monday, December 27, before a large audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Ada Patterson, Miss Marie Bellas, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. R. Grice. The band and choir numbered 350 performers. Mr. J. H. Beers officiated as leader, Mr. C. Chambers, M.B., presided at the organ, and Dr. Rea conducted. The Oratorio was excellently rendered. Miss Bellas, R.A.M., formerly a pupil of Dr. Rea's, created a marked impression in the contralto solos.

New York.—The choir of St. John's Chapel, Trinity Parish, sang the Oratorio of Elijah at the last regular monthly Festival Service, on the 3rd ult. Since September the following works have been given at these services:—Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, Barnby's Rebekah, Weber's Jubilee Cantata, and Spohr's Last Judgment, under the direction of the Organist, Mr. Geo. F. Le Jeune.

Northwich.—The second annual performance of The Messiah was given by the Philharmonic Society at the Central Hall, on December 29, with decided success. The principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Helen England, Mr. Webster Williams, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. Miss Larkcom in "I know that my Redeemer liveth," Miss England in "He was despised," and Mr. Tufnail in "Why do the nations," created a marked effect; and the choruses were excellently sung throughout. There was an admirable orchestra, and Mr. J. J. Stancliffe, the Society's accompanist, presided at the harmonium. The Rev. A. C. Whitley conducted with much ability.

Norwich.—On Thursday, the 20th ult., the Norwich Gatehouse Choir held its thirty-first Invitation Concert in Noverre's Rooms. The special feature of this performance was the appearance of Madame Norman-Néruda, who played with Mr. Kingston Rudd (the Conductor), Dussek's Sonata in B flat major, and was most ably supported by the pianist. Later on, Madame Néruda contributed Handel's Sonata in A major, Franz Néruda's "Berceuse Slave," and Wieniawski's Mazurka in G, in all of which her superb tone and executive powers were most advantageously displayed. The rest of the performance was in the hands of the members themselves. The chief efforts of the choir were concentrated on Jensen's Cantata The Feast of Adonis, which was effectively rendered. The principal parts were taken by Mrs. Edwin Nuthall, Miss Edith Scott, Messrs. A. J. Clarke, and John Lincoln. Amongst the detached choral pieces were the unaccompanied chorus "O gladsome light," from Sir Arthur Sullivan's new work, The Golden Legend; "We two," a pleasing part-song, by Lieb; and a very pretty part-song, "The Oyster Dredgers" (composed expressly for the choir by Mr. W. W. Pearson). The well-known trio, "The Watchman," was well sung by Messrs. John Lincoln, Edmund Reeve, and A. J. Clarke. Mr. Arthur Rudd ably shared with his brother the duties of accompanist.

Nottingham.—A Soirée of the Bowman-Hart Musical Guild was held in the Mechanics' Lecture Hall, on December 30, under the patronage of Mrs. Bowman-Hart, founder of the Guild. The members sang part-songs and solos, and the violin class also contributed to the programme. The opportunity was taken of presenting Mr. W. Smith (late Secretary to the Guild) with a testimonial, as a mark of respect from the members, Mr. J. Green occupying the chair. A part-song by the Conductor, Mr. A. Richards, was excellently rendered, and well received. It was explained during the evening by the chairman and Mrs. Bowman-Hart that the object of the Guild is to bring good music within the reach of the working classes, and into their homes.

Oswestry.—The Lodge and Bronygarth Choral Society's Concerts—which have this year taken the place of the Oswestry Annual Concerts and Competitions—were given on the 3rd ult. in the Quinta Schools, The Lodge, and proved eminently successful. The band was selected from Mr. Charles Hallé's orchestra, and the Bronygarth Choir and the Juvenile Choir assisted. At the afternoon Concert the programme consisted of Handel's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, and a miscellaneous selection. In the Ode the principal vocalists were Miss Annie Roberts and Mr. Cuthbert Blacow, both of whom were thoroughly efficient, Mr. Blacow, who sang the tenor part at only twelve hours' notice, deserving warm praise. The Ode was repeated at the evening Concert, and the second part of the programme at both performances was in the highest degree interesting. Mr. W. Hall presided with much ability at the pianoforte.

Portsmouth.—The organ which has been erected in the Lecture Hall of the Eastney Soldiers' Home, at the sole expense of Captain Burton, R.M.A., was opened on Monday, the 10th ult., when a Recital was given by Mr. Godwin Fowles, F.C.O. The string band of the R.M.A., and the Havelock Choral Union, under Mr. J. Pook's direction, also played selections. The organ was built by Messrs. Stidholt, of Woodbridge, Suffolk, and is a two-manual instrument, with twelve stops. The case is made of pitch pine, varnished, and the front speaking pipes are in apple-green and gold, the dimensions being 16 feet high, 10 feet wide, and 8 feet deep. In the interval between the two parts of the Concert, the Rev. W. J. Heaton, Wesleyan Chaplain, presented the thanks of the Trustees and Committee to Captain Burton, for his very generous gift, a compliment which was gracefully acknowledged by the donor.

Putney.—A successful Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms, in aid of a charity, on the 24th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Levina Ferrari, Mrs. A. Chapman, Mrs. Bramwell Davis, Mr. R. Grice, and Mr. A. Chapman. Dr. Phipson played two violin solos, and Miss Lewis and Miss Pink presided at the pianoforte. Miss Ferrari's singing was a special feature of the programme.

Reigate.—The members of the South Park Musical Society gave their first Concert on the 14th ult. The programme consisted of madrigals and part-songs by the choir, and songs, &c., by local amateurs. Mr. Osmond, the Society's able Conductor, is to be congratulated on what was really an excellent musical performance. The principal vocalists were Miss Nettie Lowden, Mr. J. G. Shuter, Mr. F. Capon, and Mr. Seymour Kelly, who has a fine voice and gained much applause. Mr. Oakshott was the solo violoncellist. Miss Emily Read presided at the piano, and Mr. W. A. Shepherd at the harmonium.

Ryde, I.W.—An excellent Concert, organised by Miss Pilkington, was given on the 10th ult., when the hall was densely crowded. Through indisposition, Mr. Conlan, a well known local tenor, being unable to appear, Mr. Pillow, from Chichester, kindly took his place at a few hours' notice, and was highly successful. The other soloists were Mrs. S. Wood, Mrs. C. Dawbury, and Mr. D. Watkins. The programme included Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and his unfinished opera Loreley. The choir numbered about seventy.

Salisbury.—At a special meeting of members of the Vocal Union, on December 23, an illuminated address was presented to Mr. J. M. Hayden, the Hon. Conductor of the Society, as a mark of appreciation of his valuable services. The testimonial is exquisitely designed, the frame (a handsome gilt one) having a shield at each corner, on which is the City arms, the monogram of the Conductor, that of the Vocal Union, and the year 1886.

Shanklin, I.W.—On Friday evening, the 7th ult., a Concert was given in the Institute in aid of the Old Church Parochial Fund. Miss Cole, who had organised the Concert, was ably assisted by Miss Kate Norman and several amateurs of local repute. The programme, which was miscellaneous, was admirably rendered, and received with frequent demonstrations of approval. The whole of the pianoforte accompaniments were performed by Miss Cole.

Sligo.—The Musical Society gave a performance of The Messiah on the 4th ult., in the Town Hall. The accompaniments were played on the pianoforte and harmonium. Mr. A. T. Froggatt conducted.

Tewkesbury.—Mr. D. Hemingway, F.C.O., Organist of the Abbey Church, gave an Organ Recital in that edifice on Thursday evening, the 20th ult., interspersed with excerpts from the Christmas music of Handel's Messiah, the solos being excellently rendered by Mrs. Carbonell, Mrs. Hemingway, Miss Watson, and the Rev. F. R. Carbonell, and the choruses by a choir of seventy-five voices. The service was opened and closed by a short prayer and hymn. There was a good attendance.

Trinidad, W.I.—Gounod's Redemption was performed in the Prince's Building, Port of Spain, on Thursday, November 25, 1886. The chorus, numbering over seventy, was furnished chiefly by the choirs of the Cathedral and Greyfriars Presbyterian Church, and the orchestra was mainly composed of members of the Port of Spain Philharmonic Society. The Rev. W. S. Doorly, Organist of the Cathedral and Sub-Director of the Philharmonic Society, conducted, and the principal solos were taken by Miss Donnatien, Mrs. Doorly, and Messrs. Gatty, Eckstein, and Collens. The performance was in aid of the Greyfriars' Building Fund, which will, it is believed, be materially benefited by it.

Wednesbury.—A performance of The Messiah was given in the Town Hall, on Monday, December 27, by the Philharmonic Society, before a large audience. The principal vocalists were Mrs. J. Hamilton, Miss Rose Barney, Mr. E. Longmore, and Mr. Bingley Shaw, of Southwell Cathedral; Organist, Mr. W. Hinsley; leader of band, Mr. F. Dicken; Conductor, Mr. W. H. H. Knight. Mr. Longmore was encored in "Thou shalt dash them," as was Mr. Bingley Shaw for his fine rendering of "Why do the nations."

Wellington, N.Z.—The annual meeting of the Harmonic Club was held on November 5, at which a report of the work done during the past year was read. Three Subscription Concerts have been given, the programmes including Gade's Psyche, Barnett's Building of the Ship, Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, and a selection from Benedict's St. Peter, together with miscellaneous choral and instrumental pieces. The members warmly acknowledged the services of Mr. C. Rous-Marten, who had conducted two of the Concerts during the absence in England of the Musical Director, Mr. Robert Parker, who was re-elected to the post for the eighth season. Bennett's Woman of Samaria and May Queen, Lloyd's Song of Balder, and Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion are the principal works announced for the season of 1887.

WHITLEY.—Mr. F. J. Read, Mus. Bac., Organist of Christ Church, gave an Organ Recital in the church, on Tuesday, December 27, in aid of the Organ Improvement Fund. The performance, it is needless to say, was much enjoyed. Mr. Read has recently resigned the office of Organist, having received the appointment of Organist at Chichester Cathedral.

WORCESTER.—The Worcestershire Musical Union, which was established only a few years since, to give amateurs living in the County of Worcester an opportunity of taking part in, and of listening to, high-class music, gave its fourteenth Concert on the 12th ult. Having already performed Bennett's Woman of Samaria, Beethoven's Mass in C, The Hymn of Praise, and selections from Spohr's Jessonda and Weber's Oberon, the work chosen on this occasion was Mendelssohn's Elijah, the rendering of which was, on the whole, very successful. The choir was thoroughly satisfactory; and the band, chiefly professional, and, for the most part, the élite of Mr. Stockley's Birmingham orchestra, played with care. The soloists were most efficient, and the Conductor, the Rev. E. V. Hall (Precentor of the Cathedral), must have bestowed much time and trouble on the work of preparation, in order to bring about so good a result. A special word of praise must be given to Mr. Montagu Worlock and Mrs. Mason, R.A.M., for their excellent singing.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Francis Adams, to Bexley Heath Congregational Church.—Miss Edith E. Edwards, to Brockley Presbyterian Church.—Mr. Henry Bowles, to Commercial Street Chapel, Northampton.—Mr. John Henderson, to the Earl of Rosslyn's Private Chapel, Rosslyn.

CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Hugh Davies (Alto), to the Church of the Spanish Embassy, Manchester Square.—Mr. Ager Grover (Principal Tenor), to St. Marylebone Parish Church.—Mr. Walter Crowest (Alto), to St. Saviour's, Hans Place, S.W.

CONCONE'S LESSONS

WITH MARKS OF

EXPRESSION & PHRASING

BY

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence each.

50 Lessons for the Medium part of the Voice.

40 Lessons for Contralto.

40 Lessons for Bass or Baritone.

The sterling value and great usefulness of Concone's Lessons have been so long recognised and so generally admitted, that their extensive adoption caused, as a natural consequence, the issue of numerous editions in almost every country where the study of the Art of Singing is cultivated. No edition, however, which has hitherto come under my notice, seems to me as correct, complete, and reliable as it should be.

I have endeavoured to rectify this deficiency by adding in the present edition signs of expression and phrasing, where I considered it expedient to do so, completing, and in some cases altering, the breathing marks, and altogether carefully revising the whole work.

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY,

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL,

COMPOSER OF THE "HOLY CITY," "RUTH," &c.

SHEFFIELD INDEPENDENT.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed, the work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be congratulated upon another success."

MUSICAL STANDARD.

"In this fresh musical product Mr. Gaul has the advantage of an open field, till very recently closed almost entirely to the Anglican Church composer; so that at the outset his work claims the merit of distinctiveness. The text of Mr. Gaul's work, varied and elaborate in structure, is the compilation of the Rev. J. C. Blissard, author at the same time of the original lyrical portions of the work. The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes,' the literary construction of these being similar in plan throughout, but each preserving its own separate unity and point of narrative or dramatic interest. The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The traitor of the table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Each comprises a prophetic portion (the words selected from those passages of Holy Writ 'foreshadowing' the event), and preceded by a short choral, which is retained unaltered throughout the work; a narrative portion dealing with the especial event, and what may be termed the lyrical epode, a hymn embodying the subjective reflection on the preceding passages, and in which the whole congregation is supposed to take part. The author has executed the compilation and versification with commendable judgment and skill. As regards the composer's share in the work, it must be noted, in the first place, that whilst endeavouring to illustrate in the best manner possible the outward course of the events, the dramatic element, properly so called, has been carefully kept out of the work. Individual characterisation has been avoided by allotting the different solo musical passages without regard to any representative character. This arrangement has no doubt been prompted by judicious reasons, and there is much to be urged in its favour. Mr. Gaul has adopted the arioso style of musical setting for the solo portions of his work. In certain parts, as in the melodious solo 'Blessed are the departed,' the writing approaches the ordinary aria form, but in general the more declamatory style is preserved. There is no imitation of archaic forms in either melodies or harmony, and in the descriptive episodes the composer has not been tempted into theatrical exaggeration in order to secure dramatic effect. The style of the composition, in short, resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City' and other of the composer's works. Among the items which impressed us most favourably was the chorus 'The fining pot is for silver,' the beautiful choral passage 'Watch and pray,' the whole of the choral passages of the Condemnation scene (the original treatment of this scene evades any comparison with this part of the Passion music of other writers); the contralto air 'Oh, hear ye this, all ye people'; the fine chorus 'Consider this,' the culminating point of the scene on Calvary; the trio for soprano, tenor, and bass 'Thou hidest Thy face, O Lord'; the quartet 'Hath God forgotten to be gracious'; the strikingly effective chorus 'God is not a man that He should lie'; the solo before mentioned, 'Blessed are the departed,' with its choral appendage (soli quartet); and last, but not least in merit, the fine setting of Adelaide Procter's lines, 'Why should'st thou fear the beautiful angel Death,' full like the poem of a sweet, subdued, delicious calm. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn-tunes for Mr. Blissard's lyrics; the tunes selected for this occasion were from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition. An overflowing congregation testified to the great interest taken in the service. On Saturday evening the work was repeated, the attendance being almost equally large with that of the previous evening."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY MAIL.

"A second experience simply confirms the remark hazarded on the first representation—viz., that the work is not only the most important Mr. Gaul has yet given to the world of art, but is one that, when familiar, must arrest attention."

SONG OF JUBILEE

SACRED CANTATA

BY

DR. BRADFORD

Composed in celebration of the Fiftieth Year of Her Majesty's Reign.

Will be ready on March 1.

NOW READY.

THE VICTORIAN AGE

A CANTATA

FOR THE

JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN.

WORDS BY

F. E. WEATHERLY

MUSIC BY

J. L. ROECKEL.

ARGUMENT.

The Cantata is an attempt to sketch for musical treatment the prominent features of the fifty years of Her Majesty's beneficent reign. Those features appear to be the spread of Education, religious and secular; the repeated extension of the Franchise; the abnormal growth of Trade and Luxury, with the usual consequents of Depression and Dishonesty in work; the useful lessons of War; the development of the Colonies, and, in more recent times, the cry for Federation.

NEW WORK.

ARRANGEMENTS for the Organ. By W. J. WESTBROOK, Mus. Doc. This work has been designed to meet the wants of those Organists who have to play organs more or less incomplete. The whole of the pieces may be played, therefore, upon organs with two keyboards; many of them, by a little management, upon organs with only one. The pedal is, of course, indispensable. It has been the aim to make all the pieces thoroughly playable, and as easy as was consistent with their due effect.

This work is clearly printed (with an independent stave for the pedals throughout) upon 251 full music-size pages of the usual organ oblong form, and in one edition only, viz., the three separate parts.

The subscription is for either part, or for all, as follows:—

Part I.	10s. 6d. net, post-free.
Part II.	5s. 3d. ,, ,,
Part III.	7s. 6d. ,, ,,
Or the Complete Work	21s. 0d. ,, ,,

When the subscription list is closed, the work will only be obtainable from the publishers at the full marked net price.

The majority of the pieces are of rather an easy nature, intricate combinations of the manual and pedal parts being carefully avoided, and, in order to facilitate playing, fingering and pedal-marks are plentifully given.

This makes the thirty-six Short and Easy Voluntaries particularly useful to young students, and for teaching purposes, as the master is spared considerable trouble in making guiding-marks for a pupil, and the latter will be less likely to go astray when practising alone.

It is hoped that the Twenty-two Marches will supply an acknowledged want of a set of concluding Voluntaries for Divine Service that will not make unreasonable demands upon the player, and yet at the same time will be fairly solid and effective.

The whole work is mostly set for organs of two manuals; for, though the third manual is not forgotten, it is borne in mind that most instruments in this country have two manuals only, and that, while pieces written for two manuals can always be played upon one having three, those written for three cannot so easily be played upon two, for which, indeed, they require adaptation and re-arrangement, thus giving an organist something else to manage in addition to the execution of the piece.

It is generally acknowledged that close printing makes the reading of music a more difficult task than when it is more clearly spread out. By allowing the music ample space upon the plates this is obviated in the present work.

The first four Lists of Subscribers were published in The Musical Times for October last and following months, and the fifth List will be issued in March. Subscriptions should be sent at once (quoting church appointment, if any) to the Composer, BURLINGTON VILLA, UNDERHILL ROAD, LORDSHIP LANE, S.E., as the List is now closing.

"VICTORIA,"

ODE FOR

THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE

Composed expressly for Mr. SIMS REEVES

BY

WILLIAM CARTER

ASTLEY H. BALDWIN.

ALL honour to thee, Empress Queen!
So blest of Heaven thy reign hath been,
That day by day, from shore to shore,
Thy subjects love thee more and more,
Victoria!

For fifty years thine Empire Grand
Has gathered might from land to land:
Thy name is loved from sea to sea,
And everywhere men honour thee,
Victoria!

From Canada to India fair
We all for thee would do and dare:
Australia, Cape—all join to own
The glorious lustre of thy throne,
Victoria!

O noble, tender, true and pure,
Thy fame for ages shall endure,
Thou truly great and wise and good,
Thou perfect type of womanhood,
Victoria!

Thy people's love and faith are thine,
Far, far beyond all gems they shine:
Beloved Monarch—Mother—Wife,
God bless thee with eternal life,
Victoria!

"As a composition the Ode has considerable merit, the effect of the chorus in the repetition of Her Majesty's name at the end of each verse is good, and its performance during the coming year of celebration is likely to become general. . . . Miss Mary Davies was rewarded by a storm of applause and a hearty encore."—Standard, Jan. 1, 1887.

"The Ode has bold and flowing tunefulness, together with a patriotic ring that must carry it into public favour during the next few months. Both words and music have indeed all the more striking claims to popularity, not the least important characteristics being the smoothness of the musical phrases and the adaptability of the work to small or large choral societies."—Daily Chronicle, Jan. 1, 1887.

Published (in two keys) by NOVELLO, EWER AND CO., 1, Berners Street (W.)
Price 4s. Also arranged as Chorus, Octavo, price 4d.

Words by EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are our special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The pianoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary pianist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

FOURTH EDITION.

THE SHIPWRECK

BIRMINGHAM PRIZE GLEE

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

MORNING.

'Tis morn, and the gallant bark bounds free,
In the joyous gale o'er a sunlit sea:
And the waves, as they merrily waft her along,
Welcome her onward with dance and song.
But a black cloud looms from the western sky,
And tells as it scuds of a tempest nigh,
And the sea-eagle screams as he flaps in the shrouds,
Like a warning voice from the bursting clouds.

THE STORM.

It comes! the storm! the shrieking, shattering storm,
With the thunder's crash and the lightning's flash,
'Mid the yawning skies and the wild waves' dash!
See yonder, that form—'tis the fiend of the storm!
How he whirls the good ship in the might of his wrath,
To the gulf where the foam surges white in his path!
And a wild cry rings thro' the tempest shrill,
As she sinks in the billows, and all is still.

EVENING.

'Tis eve on the waters:—an ocean of light
Bares its breast to the moon, rising gentle and bright;
And the stars, as they beam on the silvery main,
On the calm of its depths are all mirror'd again.
Ah, list! o'er the deep doth a melody sweep,
Now the storm fiend hath flown, and the waves are asleep;
Ah, list! o'er the grave of the true and the brave!
'Tis the mermaiden singing her dirge on the wave.

Price Fourpence.

The gratuitous loan of Band Parts can be had from the Composer, as also an arrangement of the Orchestral Parts as Pianoforte Duet, for use when a Band is not available.

SEASON 1887.

The arrangements for the ensuing Season will comprise:—

(a) A Conversazione, to be held in June, on which occasion DR. HANS RICHTER has kindly consented to conduct the "Siegfried-Idyll." A Choir chosen from the German Choral Societies and a Ladies' Chorus will perform selections from Wagner's dramas. Mr. Walter Bache and several other eminent artists have also promised their assistance. Date and locale will be duly announced.

(b) Four Social Meetings of the members of the Society, to be held at Trinity College, Mandeville Place, W. (by permission of the Academical Board), at which papers on Wagnerian subjects will be read and discussed. Messrs. FERDINAND PRAEGER, W. ASHTON ELLIS, E. F. JACQUES, and CHARLES DOWDESWELL have accepted the Committee's invitation to contribute papers, the first of which will be read on March 10.

A subscription of 10s., payable annually on the first of January of each year, constitutes membership. Out of this, the sum of 4s. is transmitted to Munich for the furtherance of the general objects of the United Richard Wagner Society; the balance of 6s. being retained for the working expenses of the London Branch.

It seems strange that though Germany and France have each a periodical exclusively devoted to the furtherance of the Wagner movement, England possesses nothing whatever of the kind. In order to supply this want, it is proposed to start a

which shall contain, inter alia:—

(1) Translations of portions of the ten volumes of Wagner's prose writings.
(2) Original articles.
(3) Correspondence upon all topics connected with the movement.
(4) Notes and news.
(5) A record of the Society's transactions.

As the Committee of the Wagner Society, though favouring the project, do not see their way to support it out of the funds of the Society, a small extra subscription will have to be raised for that purpose. Upon inquiry, it has been found that the periodical can be made self-supporting if one hundred annual subscriptions of 4s. can be obtained. So soon, therefore, as the required amount has been received, the periodical will be issued. Messrs. W. Ashton Ellis and E. F. Jacques have kindly consented to act as Honorary Editor and Sub-Editor.

All applications to be addressed to the Honorary Secretaries, Mr. Julius Cyriax, 33, Douglas Road, N., or Mr. Charles Dowdeswell, Brantwood, Macaulay Road, Clapham Common, S.W.

CHORAL EXHIBITIONS,

Trinity College, Cambridge.

Two Choral Exhibitions at this College will be offered for competition on May 10 next, each of the value of £80 per annum, and tenable for three years.

Candidates with Alto, Tenor, Baritone, or Bass voices may compete, but one at least of the Exhibitions will, by preference, be given to a Bass. Candidates must be not more than twenty-five years of age.

The Exhibitioners will be required (if not already members of the College) to commence residence in the College as Undergraduates at Michaelmas, to reside the usual number of terms, and to proceed to a degree.

Further particulars regarding the examination, &c., may be obtained from the Rev. the Senior Dean, Trinity College, Cambridge. An early application is advised.

THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY offers TWO PRIZES, being the "Molineux Prize" of Ten Pounds with the Medal, and the "Society's Prize" of Five Pounds, for the best and second best APPROVED MADRIGALS in not less than four, nor more than six parts, the upper part or parts to be for one or two treble voices. The character of the composition to be in accordance with that of Madrigals of the best style and form, with imitative part-writing; not a mere part-song or harmonised melody.

The following conditions must be complied with, viz.:—

1. That the Alto and Tenor parts be written in their respective clefs.
2. That the signature be repeated at the head of each page at least;
3. That the intended Tempo be clearly indicated; and
4. That the words be written out in full on a fly-leaf at the beginning.

The Madrigals to be delivered, addressed to the Secretary of the Madrigal Society, Woodside, Caterham, Surrey, on or before October 1, 1887, each composition having a device or motto affixed thereto, with the composer's name in a sealed envelope bearing a corresponding mark.

The award of the judges will be made known at the meeting of the Society in December, 1887.

A MEDITATION

ON THE

Sacred Passion of the Holy Redeemer

THE WORDS SELECTED AND WRITTEN BY THE

REV. J. SPARROW SIMPSON, M.A.

J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary parish churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, will contain the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

THE FUTURE OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

Doubtless our readers have followed with sympathetic interest the discussion which has arisen concerning the Crystal Palace. Amateurs of music cannot regard indifferently the future of an institution so much connected with their art. Whatever else the beautiful building on Sydenham Hill may or may not be, it is a temple of music, and has done more to promote the best interests of music than any other that can be named. We need not take pains to demonstrate this. Our readers will remember the Saturday Concerts, the Handel Festivals, the daily services of an admirable orchestra, the special performances on a scale possible nowhere else, and the thousand and one occasions into which, year by year, music has entered as an important auxiliary. Thinking of all these things, amateurs rightly regard their own class as more nearly concerned in the fate of the Crystal Palace than any other. We make no apology, therefore, for devoting a portion of our space to a consideration of its interests.

That the Palace is in a bad way seems clear enough. Its fortunes, long declining, have now reached a depth lower than which they cannot go without absolute ruin. At the half-yearly meeting of the Company, Major Dickson, the chairman, made a speech indicative almost of hope abandoned. He had to tell of lessened support, diminishing receipts, and inability to meet financial obligations, while he could hold out no certain prospect of a change for the better. Major Dickson, it is true, was of opinion that the present year opened with a brighter outlook than did 1886. "The exhibitions at South Kensington had come to an end, the foundation stone of the new exhibition was not yet laid, and as to the rumour that the Albert Hall was going to be turned into a music hall, and the adjoining grounds into a sort of Cremorne, he hoped that wiser counsels would prevail." A chairman must, of course, put the best face on matters, and do all he can to keep up the spirits of his shareholders, but when the grounds of Major Dickson's optimism, such as it was, are looked into, they do not amount to much. At any rate, they scarcely touch the fact that for years past the public have been learning to stay away from the Crystal Palace, which no longer comes first to mind when a question of amusement and relaxation arises. The South Kensington shows undoubtedly accentuated this state of things, by presenting a rival and more accessible attraction, but they did not originate it. Public indifference to the Crystal Palace is the result of many causes, and we should remember that, when once this state of mind sets in, its natural tendency is to spread and deepen. Just as "Nothing succeeds like success," nothing fails so rapidly and surely as failure; evidence of which now appears in the fact that even the Saturday Concerts have lost ground. Though excellent as ever, and conducted upon the most liberal principles, the patronage bestowed upon the Concerts is nothing like what it once was. At many of the performances a saddening array of empty benches shows that the canker of public neglect has eaten very far into the fortunes of the Palace. The Concerts should be the last to suffer, and since they are suffering the outlook is dark indeed. We fear, therefore, that no reliance can safely be placed upon the considerations mentioned by Major Dickson. A modicum of advantage may, no doubt, arise from the cessation of the rival show at South Kensington, but he must be a very sanguine, and not a very observant, man who expects any material or permanent change for the better. It follows that only extraordinary measures can arrest the downward course of the institution. To continue as at present is to incur certain and not very distant disaster.

In the emergency which has arisen, the friends of the Palace naturally look to its directors for evidence that they are equal to their responsibilities and fertile in resource. Very little of such evidence appears to be forthcoming. Major Dickson intimated that the directors would promote a Bill in Parliament with a view to lighten their financial burdens, and that, no doubt, is an important matter. Much more important, however, are measures tending to re-create public sympathy and support, and of these none seem to be forthcoming. Major Dickson could only speak in general terms about maintaining the "high character and prestige" of the enterprise, attracting the "patronage and support of the aristocracy of wealth and education," and of taking care not to level down to the million. We scarcely know what the chairman means by levelling down to the million, but we would respectfully point out that the policy he advocates is that which the directors have all along maintained. They have scrupulously preserved the high character of the Palace, and the public, at the same time, have more and more generally agreed to stay away. It is obvious that the labour of the directors in this respect must be supplemented, since high character and prestige cannot of themselves make both ends meet. Thus the question "What should be done?" comes fairly before those who have the welfare of the Palace at heart. Its consideration may be carried on in two different ways. That is to say, we may regard the Crystal Palace as a business enterprise which has fallen into difficulties and needs to be financed or otherwise managed out of them; or we may look upon it as an institution, performing a work of public beneficence, and having claims such as no mere business enterprise can possibly advance. From the first point of view, the general public see little with which they can be expected to concern themselves, beyond the question of so working the business as to attract customers. Matters of finance are for those who have risked their money, and who may be considered competent to take care of themselves without outside aid. But with the question of managing the Palace as a place of entertainment everybody is more or less concerned. On this point there has been of late suggestions in plenty. One gentleman, writing to The Times, brings no fewer than eight charges against the directors, each of them involving a recommendation. Thus we gather that, in his opinion, less dependence should be placed upon temporary expedients such as the Handel Festivals; that extra charges within the building should be abolished; that the refreshment tariff should be amended; that there should be more music to be freely enjoyed by all; that persons who would bring attractions to the building should be dealt with liberally; that "stale music-hall entertainments" should be abolished; that permanent interests in the Palace (presumably those of stall-keepers and exhibitors) should be more carefully regarded; and that "monstrosities" and "permanent eyesores" should be removed. Another gentleman demands attractive evening entertainments for the thousands who live in the neighbourhood and along the line. He calls for evening music, evening lectures, theatrical performances, and so on, complaining that "at present the Palace is shut when it ought to be open, and all of us who go to London to our work are obliged to go to London again for what amusement or relaxation we require." A third letter-writer to The Times declares that the management of the Palace has continued too long on old and rather antiquated lines, so that, instead of entering into brisk competition with its rivals, its tendency is always to live upon its reputation. This candid friend would scarcely preserve the high character of the Palace in Major Dickson's sense. He goes on: "Popular evening entertainments are never attempted; a ballet, except by children, is never seen. Yet the Alhambra can pay 47 per cent. dividend. When a 'variety' entertainment is given, it is a meagre affair as regards time, lasting usually from six o'clock to nearly seven, just when nobody cares to see it—I mean nobody going from town. Popular music, popular songs, and the popular element generally is scarcely considered at all, so popular support is not found." Other critics follow on with complaints of the railway arrangements, and it is certainly not the fault of the public if the directors have not now enough to think about for a long time to come. The counsellors may speak sometimes other words than those of wisdom, but the directors would be still more foolish if they neglected the arguments and advice of the many who wish them well. There is a good deal of shrewdness, for example, in more than one or two of the suggestions made above, especially in that which recommends keeping open the Palace as a place of evening amusement for residents in the locality. It is obviously desirable, also, to abolish extra charges, which have an irritating effect even upon those who decline to pay them, and to treat the refreshment contractor as a friend and ally rather than as one out of whom to squeeze as much as possible, regardless of the certainty that he will retaliate upon his customers and promote discontent. But, without further attention to details, we would urge as a main point close and careful study of methods by which the Palace may regain touch of the multitude. Major Dickson's idea, that, if the patronage of "the classes" can be secured, the support of "the masses" will follow may be a true one, though we doubt it; but surely a better and safer course is to attract the masses by direct means. This would necessarily involve "levelling down to the million," but those who use such an unworthy expression should remember that the million are steadily rising in knowledge and taste, and even now might challenge comparison with the ten thousand. It was not by angling for the "aristocracy of wealth and education" that the late Robert K. Bowley made prosperous his reign at the Crystal Palace, but by carefully divining what the million wanted and promptly supplying it. There is great reason to fear that the Crystal Palace has been managed of late years on the principle of providing that which the public ought to like rather than that which they actually prefer. There could be no more fatal course for a business enterprise, the first necessity of which is adaptation to the market it desires to command. That to keep in touch with the multitude involves the degradation of the Palace we entirely decline to believe, and general sympathy and support will attend the directors whenever they set themselves energetically to meet public wants, and cater with spirit and liberality for the shilling visitor.

Taking the state of the Palace into consideration as that of a beneficent institution which it is desirable to preserve in the interest of the public, we are at once met by the difficulty of altogether dissociating the enterprise from its character as a business speculation. The one condition seems incompatible with the other, and an attempt to reconcile them has led well-meaning friends to propositions that can hardly be reconciled with ordinary rule. Major Flood Page, for example, suggests that the debenture stockholders should accept a lower rate of interest for their money, and spurs them on by declaring that the collapse of the Palace would entail a loss of half their capital. Furthermore, he urges that the freeholders and leaseholders of the neighbourhood should put their hands in their pockets on behalf of the glass house; that the general public should take season tickets whether they want them or not; that a guarantee fund should be started; that individuals should purchase stock and make the company a present of the dividends, and so on. The only reason for these acts of sacrifice is that the Palace confers a public benefit, and the classes appealed to might well ask why the expense should fall upon them alone, and why such of them as are not stockholders should tax themselves to provide a dividend for a public company. We will not insist upon the fact that uncertain charity is a bad foundation for an enterprise that cannot pay its way on business principles. The main consideration lies just here—the Crystal Palace cannot be, at the same time, a trading company seeking a dividend and an institution subsisting to some extent upon public offerings. One or the other of these characters must be sacrificed in order to make the position clear and intelligible. A business concern has no right to be sending round the hat; a benevolent concern ought not to be worked with a view to a percentage for speculative investors. This, we think, must be clear enough to every one who gives the matter a thought. The question now arises as to the character that may most profitably be abandoned.

It has already appeared that we are not among those who despair of the Palace as a business enterprise. Assuming that the Company can get their finance bill through Parliament, infuse greater shrewdness and energy into their management, and make their visitors comfortable by dealing with them liberally, we see no insurmountable obstacle to a smooth and easy course. But the assumption involves a good many elements of uncertainty and even of risk. That which has happened in the past is very likely to occur again, and there will always be the temptation to snatch a present dividend by measures involving future mischief. Moreover—we urge this once more, because it lies at the root of the matter—so long as the Palace remains an ordinary trading concern, so long will those hold aloof who would otherwise help it out of difficulties. All considerations point to the necessity for extinguishing mere business interests in the Palace, and maintaining it as a national or quasi-national institution, working not for a dividend, but for the good of the people. How is this to be done?

The end just suggested is attainable in two ways. First, by the formation of a new Company, coming under the Limited Liability Act as a Company not working for profit. Many such are already in existence for artistic, charitable, and other kindred purposes, though none, we believe, on so large a scale as that now suggested. Assuming that the public prove their interest in the Palace by raising a sufficient sum to buy out the present proprietors, there would be no difficulty whatever in carrying on the enterprise with abundant liberality, and obtaining from it all the public good possible. Having only working expenses and maintenance to care for, the directors would find their hands free, with the additional advantage of not being so absolutely dependent as to be compelled to follow where, as guides and instructors, they ought to lead. The question whether the public are likely to find the money for such a self-denying investment is one difficult to answer without fuller knowledge. Judging from newspaper correspondence, and gatherings of sympathisers, there seems to be a good deal of feeling in the matter. But feeling costs nothing, and much of it fails to attain the influence that compels a man to take out his purse. Happily, there remains a method by which the interests of the Palace can be associated with a passing event of national importance, and derive from it, we hope, no inconsiderable help. This is the second course mentioned above. Lord Tennyson, we believe, enjoys the credit of having first suggested that the Crystal Palace should be made a memorial of the Queen's Jubilee—a "Royal Crystal Palace." The idea is singularly happy and appropriate. Not only so, but it brings the notion of purchasing the building and carrying it on solely for the public good within the region of that which is practical. The metropolis might charge itself with this duty, especially now that the project of an Imperial Institute is found lacking in popular sympathy. There could be no better Jubilee cry for London than the transformation of the Crystal Palace into a metropolitan memorial. It would appeal strongly to the imagination, as well as to the interest, of the people at large; it would indicate a method by which loyal offerings might do the greatest possible amount of good, and it would enable London to secure for all time a souvenir of the Jubilee proportionate to the wealth and dignity of the capital of the British Empire. Here, then, we have a practical course, which its supporters should lose no time in bringing forward. The Crystal Palace, as a Jubilee institution, bought by public offerings, confided to the care, as trustees, of men eminent in society, in art, and in science, and managed with a view to the greatest happiness of the greatest number—this seems to us the only satisfactory way out of present difficulties. London, if so minded, could raise the necessary funds in a week, and not feel the operation. The question is whether London appreciates a grand opportunity, and finds in itself the necessary public spirit.

SCHUMANN'S "GENOVEVA."

On the 8th of this month the Bach Choir will give, for the first time in England, the whole of the first act of Schumann's "Genoveva," and selections from the other acts. In view of this performance it may interest our readers to hear something about the legend, the German tragedies of "Genoveva" by Tieck and Hebbel, Schumann's libretto, and also something about the criticisms passed on the work after its production at Leipzig in 1850. Of the music itself we cannot form a definite opinion until it has been heard here, but in describing the plot we may perhaps venture one or two general remarks about its character and the impression which it has made upon us in reading.

In the year 1840 Robert Schumann began to think of writing an opera, but beyond noting down in a book a number of subjects, he really did nothing in the matter until the year 1847, when he heard Hebbel's drama "Genoveva." He was so taken with it that he resolved to write an opera on the subject. It was completed in 1848, and first performed at Leipzig on June 25, 1850. The story of Geneviève has been a favourite one with novelists and dramatists, and has even formed the subject of an Opéra Bouffon ("Geneviève de Brabant," par Offenbach) and of a pantomime ("Geneviève ou la confiance trahie," par Franconi).

Freher, in his "Origines du Palatinat," tells us how the Count Palatine Siffroi left his wife Geneviève de Brabant at home when he joined the army which the famous Charles Martel was leading against the Saracens and their king Abd-el-Rahman. She was placed under the care of his intendant, Golo. In vain the latter urges her to forget her duty to her husband, and, stung by failure, he denounces her as faithless to the Count. Siffroi gives orders to drown Geneviève and the child to which she has given birth. The servants to whom is entrusted the carrying out of this cruel order merely abandon her in a desert place. There mother and child live for a long time, having for sole nourishment wild fruits and the milk of a hind. They are discovered by the Count himself; matters are explained, and they are brought back to the palace. The treachery of Golo is proved, and he is ordered to be torn to pieces by wild bulls. On the spot where she was found Geneviève ordered a chapel to be erected to the Virgin. This is supposed to have been the Frauenkirche, now in ruins, and which at one time was visited by many pilgrims.

On the title-page of Schumann's opera we find the words "nach Tieck und Hebbel." J. L. Tieck, so well known as the completer of the German translation of Shakespeare, wrote many plays, among which was one entitled "Leben und Tod der heiligen Genoveva," which was produced, we believe, in 1800, and published in 1804. The work is full of episodical matter, and we shall attempt only the briefest possible outline of the plot. First we have the leave-taking of Siegfried and Genoveva. Golo makes love to Genoveva, but she will not listen to him; so, baffled in his attempts, he accuses her of infidelity with Drago, one of the old servants of the castle. Genoveva is sent to the tower, Drago to a dungeon. Siegfried, returning from the wars, but delayed by his wounds in Avignon, is informed of his wife's misconduct, and, confirmed by what he sees and hears at the house of the sorceress Winfreda, orders her and her child to be killed. But they are merely left by the persons charged to execute the deed to die of hunger or to be torn to pieces by wild animals. Siegfried, on his return to his castle, by a letter left by Genoveva, discovers the treachery of Golo. While out hunting he meets Genoveva and her son in a desert place; she begs that Golo may be forgiven, but he is nevertheless put to death.

But besides Siegfried's castle, with its tale of love and intrigue, the spectator is bidden to gaze at the camps of the Saracens and Christians, and even at the field of battle. From the point of view of contrast, no doubt, this may prove effective on the stage. Abd-el-Rahman and Charles Martel both figure in these war scenes. There are a number of characters in the play, to say nothing of Ghosts, Death, and the holy Bonifacius, who is the alpha and omega of the piece.

Hebbel's tragedy entitled "Genoveva" was produced in Germany in 1843. It is principally upon this that Schumann's libretto is based, as he indeed, in a letter, informs his friend, H. Dorn. Here we have again the leave-taking of husband and wife, the wild passion and hellish plot of Golo, the sorcerer's chamber, and the cruel order of Siegfried. But, as in Tieck, so here, mother and child are abandoned in the wilderness. Siegfried returns, believing they are dead. He advises Golo to go and travel and forget the sad story. But Golo, smitten with remorse, blinds himself, and, as the curtain falls, the servant Caspar is about to hew him to the ground with his sword. The whole of this drama is wild and exciting; it contains much fine writing, but the characters are decidedly stagey. However, the work only concerns us in regard to Schumann's libretto. It will be seen how he has made use of both the dramas. The libretto was originally written by the poet-painter, Robert Reinick; but Schumann altered it, and the poet renounced all claim to its authorship.

The overture to Schumann's opera is well-known. It is one of the composer's finest efforts, and though as abstract music perfectly satisfactory, it may add to its interest to know that it foreshadows to some extent the events of the play. Thus the opening prominent and repeated chord of the ninth accompanies the words of Golo, "Und ich ein Mensch soll diesen Himmel wahren." Then the little figure in the fourth bar with the sf. and shake may be denominated the curse motive, for it precedes Golo's curse on Genoveva in the second act. We have this figure again in the fourth act, when Golo meets Genoveva. In the overture proper (for we have been speaking of the slow introduction only) we are reminded of Siegfried, and of the happy dénouement. At the beginning of the first act, we have on one side of the stage Siegfried's castle, on the other a church, and at the back, in the middle, a gate and drawbridge. Knights and their retinue sing a fine choral, expressing their readiness to go to death for God's sake. Hidulfus, Bishop of Trèves, then comes out of the church, calling upon Count Siegfried to join the crusade against Christ's enemies. The arch-enemy at that time was the famous Abd-el-Rahman, who invaded France, and was defeated by Charles Martel at the great battle of Tours in 733. Golo now comes forward and regrets that he is not allowed to join the warriors, but that he must stay behind and watch over "that Paradise" as he calls the virtuous Genoveva. Siegfried and his wife now come out of the castle, and we have a short but thoroughly Schumannish duet between the two. Siegfried then addresses a few words to the servants, and confides his wife to Golo's care. The sound of trumpets is heard, and warriors advancing on the stage sing in loud and rhythmical strains of the delight of going to join the brave Charles Martel. Meanwhile Siegfried mounts his horse and rides off. Golo is left with Genoveva; she faints, and he embraces her. Musically, the whole of this recitative is exceedingly interesting. The two have been watched by Margaretha, foster-mother of Golo; she has a grudge against him, for some time before she had been dismissed by his orders from the castle. What she has just witnessed awakens in her thoughts of vengeance. She tells him that she perceives his passion, and that she will do all she can to help him to win the love of Genoveva. That attempt she doubtless hopes and believes will prove his ruin. The first phrase of the music assigned to Margaretha carries us back to the overture, and this we shall venture to style the Margaretha theme, for it is frequently used.

At the beginning of the second act Genoveva is in her room. She is thinking and singing about the absent one. Suddenly, behind the scenes, are heard sounds of riotous mirth and mocking. She longs for the return of Siegfried to tame the insolence of the servants of the castle. Golo enters, and after a short parley takes his zither, and places himself at Genoveva's feet. They sing the charming duet "Wenn ich ein Vöglein war," which is known as a detached piece. Then Golo gets more and more excited, and declares his love for her. Genoveva, with threatening gesture, commands him to depart. The music of this scene is decidedly in Schumann's best manner. As Golo is going away he meets Drago, who complains of the unseemly behaviour of the servants, and of their insinuations that Genoveva is somewhat too friendly with the young chaplain lately sent by Hidulfus. Here commences Golo's plot. He catches hold of these last words of Drago, pretends he knows more, and that Drago must conceal himself in Genoveva's room and find out who comes there. This done Golo and the servants break into the room; Drago of course is discovered, and, before he can give one word of explanation, is despatched by Balthasar, a servant. Genoveva is led away to the tower. The plot is thin, the characters, with the exception perhaps of Genoveva, lack interest, so here almost everything depends upon the music. Before all this happens Margaretha has promised Golo to proceed to Strassburg, where Siegfried is lying wounded on his way home from the wars, and to give him a drink which will free him from his pain, and Golo from him.

At the opening of the third act Siegfried is on a couch in an inn at Strassburg, tended by Margaretha. The mysterious potion has had no effect on him: he longs to be again on his way home. She tells him of a magic glass in Strassburg, in which he may see all he desires. But he laughs at the idea, and calls for his horse. At this moment Golo arrives, and Siegfried sees by his looks that all is not well at home. Golo hands him a letter, supposed to have been written by the chaplain of the castle. Golo, really alarmed at Siegfried's agitated countenance, regrets the cruel path along which he himself has been led by Margaretha. "He who wrote this lied," he says to Siegfried. But the latter thinking Golo only wishes to calm him pays no attention to the words. He gives him his ring and sword, and orders him to slay Genoveva and then to put an end to her unhappy husband. Siegfried, however, suddenly remembers the magic glass and resolves to go and look in it. "Dost thou believe in such a glass? I do not much," he says to his servant Conrad. The three depart. We then see Margaretha's room fitted up à la sorcière. At the back is the magic glass. Margaretha is asleep by the table. She wakes up and relates a terrible dream. Siegfried arrives and is all impatience to see into the glass. At last the curtain is withdrawn: he sees his castle, and Genoveva in an adjoining meadow field; Drago joins her and they both engage in friendly conversation. Two female voices behind the stage sing of love and its influence on tender hearts. Then a second picture is shown: it is a moonlight scene, and Genoveva and Drago are sitting in an arbour. Voices (soprano and tenor) are again heard, behind the stage, singing of the might of love. But Siegfried wishes to be further convinced, and a third picture is presented. It is Genoveva's bed-room: Drago enters, and Genoveva, waking up, stretches out her hand in a friendly manner towards him. Siegfried draws his sword, shatters the glass, and then goes off with Golo. Drago's ghost appears uttering all sorts of imprecations on Margaretha, who certainly deserves them. She vanishes from the stage enveloped in flames. The music of this incantation scene is exceedingly interesting, and at times dramatic. The figure which is heard in the orchestra in the preceding scene, when Siegfried reads the false letter, is introduced many times here quite after the manner of Wagner.

In the fourth and last act the servants, Balthasar and Caspar, are leading off Genoveva to her death. They sing a mocking song about two lovers. Genoveva, seeing no hope, calls loudly on Siegfried, and prays to heaven. Her prayers are apparently not answered; Golo appears showing her the ring and then the sword. He tells her of one way of escape, but she rejects it with scorn. The servants are then bid to execute the cruel deed, and Golo tells them that if he return not to the castle, they shall say he has gone off on horseback, falcon in hand. The two servants hesitate to kill her as she clings to a roadside cross, and while they are thus in uncertainty, Siegfried and hunters come suddenly upon them. Mutual recognition and joy. A chorus is then sung: the scene changes to that of the first act. Hidulfus comes out of the church, Genoveva and Siegfried kneel before him, and he blesses them. The final chorus is in praise of the noble wife and brave hero. The music throughout this fourth act is thoroughly in keeping with the various situations, the whole of the opening scene, as Genoveva is being led to death, is extremely pathetic, and there are some fine dramatic touches just before the arrival of Siegfried. In the interview between husband and wife, the theme of the duet of the first act is happily introduced.

A little may now be said respecting the criticisms passed on the work by German writers. Wasielewski, the biographer of Schumann, who attended rehearsals and performances at Leipzig, complains of the uncomfortable mixture of truth and fiction, nature and affectation in the Golo intrigue; and of the speedy return of Genoveva to the Count's castle in the fourth act. Of the music he says that Schumann could not quite renounce his lyric nature—in short, that the composer was not born for the stage. He makes the remark that the work "may be regarded as a struggle for greater unity of form." There are indeed indications of that struggle, and in the continuity of the music and in the attempt to weld together recitative and melody we find much that reminds us of one who, about the same time, was working in a similar direction. Schumann's aim alone imparts special interest to his work. Wasielewski, in his "Schumanniana," published at Bonn in 1883, has still a few more words to say about the work. He complains of the symphonic treatment of the orchestra standing in the way of the singer. There would not be so much objection to that now-a-days. Dr. Spitta also speaks about "Genoveva" in his article on Schumann, published in Sir George Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians." He finds that the characters all sing more or less the same kind of music, and that neither in outline nor detail is the music sufficiently generated by the situations of the drama. We need not quote his remarks at length, as his article is in so well-known and accessible a work.

F. Brendel, in notices of "Genoveva" in the July and August numbers of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik for 1850, thinks that the libretto generally is a good one, but the story he regards as unsatisfactory. The opera of the present, he declares, wants a new—a romantic Ideal. He specially fixes on the "Nibelungenlied" as likely to supply that want. His words, written many years before the performance of the "Ring des Nibelungen" at Bayreuth, are worth quoting: "Were the 'Nibelungen' used for an opera, in these days when efforts are being made to bring about German unity, the subject, with its idea of a great united fatherland, would produce an extraordinary effect." The writer has one or two complaints to make about Schumann's book—the concealment of Drago, all very well in a poem, but not on the stage—the magic business of the third act, as out of character with the rest of the tale. So far as the music is concerned, he praises Schumann for breaking with the artificial forms of Italian opera, he praises the style of recitative and the continuity of the music during each act; but he finds a want of light and shade, and hence the general effect is unsatisfactory. So, while admiring the aims of the composer to secure dramatic unity, he reluctantly admits that in his first attempt at opera he has not succeeded.

The opera was also reviewed in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik when the vocal score arranged by Madame Schumann appeared at Leipzig. The articles in question are in Nos. 13 and 14 of the year 1851. "Genoveva," it is maintained, shows no advance, but a darkening of Schumann's genius. The critic first complains of the book: the plot is weak; and there is no dramatic power. But he remarks satirically: "Perhaps tone pictures rich in figures atone for the libretto?" "The whole opera is one continued recitative," he says, "and this is more than the strongest attention can endure. It is incomprehensible to the learned as well as to the common folk." He finds no flowing, ever-green melodies which impress and pass from mouth to mouth. It is art without nature. Readers acquainted—as probably most are—with the splendid overture to "Genoveva," must hear what the Neue Zeitschrift critic thought of it, and they will then know how far to accept him as a guide: "The overture is without melodic strength. . . . It lacks clearness of form and of grouping. . . . The harmonies are often incomprehensible. The number of unprepared discords appears useless. . . . The scoring is misty." And then he begins to find fault with the first act. The choral, he admits, is fairly successful—he complains of one hard chord; and in a similar strain he writes of the double chorus of warriors. He finds fault at the beginning of the second act because "the instruments say more than the vocal part"; Genoveva's beautiful prayer he thinks more declamatory than melodic; the finale of this act he describes as a series of terrible, crushing, grinding, shrieking dissonances. And so he goes on, but we will not follow him. He is out of sympathy with Schumann's individuality and with his aims.

This must be the notice which so annoyed the composer. It was written by Dr. E. Krüger, and Dr. Spitta tells us, in the article mentioned above, that a letter addressed to Krüger by the composer put an end for ever to their acquaintance.

THE TROUVÈRES OF THE THIRTEENTH CENTURY AND THEIR SONGS.*

One of the most characteristic figures in that remarkable age of lyric poetry was undoubtedly Thibaut IV., Duke of Champagne and King of Navarre, grandson of the cultured Queen Marie of France—herself a composer of songs, and patroness of some of the most brilliant Puys, or "Courts of Love," of the twelfth century. Sovereign Prince and Trouvère, and, as such, surnamed "Le Chansonnier," Thibaut promoted, more than any other prince of his time, the cultivation of music and poetry by attracting the most eminent poet-singers to Arras which, throughout the thirteenth and even in the fourteenth century—that is to say, long after his death, in 1265, when Artois had already ceased to form part of his dominions—maintained its supremacy as the focus whence emanated all that was best in Norman-French lyric poetry. The charges which at one time were brought against Thibaut's character concerning his relations with Blanche, Queen of France, in the death of whose husband, Louis VIII., he was alleged to have been instrumental, are now universally considered false, nor, indeed, were they ever seriously believed; and even if evidence were wanted to disprove them, we need only point to his songs, which, a faithful mirror of his heart and mind, reveal him as a man of a disposition eminently gentle and refined, incapable of such sinister designs as those his detractors imputed to him. At all events, an inquiry into the merits and demerits of his character would be totally irrelevant here; and although he was certainly more successful in rhyme and song than in politics and warfare, yet it is the very fact of a man in his exalted station cultivating, in those days, music and poetry with almost professional ardour that makes his life a study at once interesting and instructive. Not only did he compose numerous songs —more than forty—which are scattered throughout the various extant MS. collections, but he also threw himself with true artistic enthusiasm into the jeux partis in which he appeared now as judge, now as challenger, as we know from his twelve jeux partis, now again as the challenged adversary of the most brilliant trouvères who graced his court or flocked to the great periodical festivals of Arras. It was Thibaut le Chansonnier who set to other sovereign princes of the thirteenth century, such as Charles of Anjou, Henri of Brabant, Robert of Artois, and King Edward I., the laudable example of identifying themselves with the festivals in the different cities of Artois, Picardy, and Flanders, on which occasions, as we have seen, they often took an active part in the proceedings as members of the jury, whilst several of them either sent, or produced in person, songs of their own composition. If lyric poetry became the fashion and mania of the day, it was in no small degree due to Thibaut's zeal and ardour in promoting it: and if, among the distinguished Artesian poet-singers of the thirteenth century, I have mentioned him last, although I should have mentioned him first, it is because he affords the most conclusive evidence, not only of the high and honoured position which the Muse had won for herself, but also of the wide and fundamental difference between the poet-singers and the ménestrels. Thibaut IV. was a trouvère, and was proud of being surnamed le Chansonnier; yet no one, assuredly, would ever pretend that he was a minstrel.

Although there are but few precise data relating to the lives even of the most eminent Artesian trouvères, yet their connection with the sovereign princes of the time, and more especially the names of the competitors and judges as we glean them from the large number—more than one hundred—of extant jeux partis, enable us to establish two periods of Norman lyric poetry, one ranging from the end of the twelfth to about the middle of the thirteenth century (about 1240), in which the leading trouvères belonged chiefly to the nobility; and another, from the middle of the thirteenth to the beginning of the fourteenth century, in which the middle class or bourgeoisie gradually became the predominant element. The first period coincides more particularly with the reign of Thibaut IV., the second with that of Charles of Anjou, and of the successors of St. Louis, Philip the Bold, and Philip the Fair. As corroborative evidence of this difference in the character of the two periods, I might mention that in some MS. collections of trouvères' songs we find miniatures in which are depicted, on a platform, two poet-singers in the rich attire of the nobility, and each wearing a crown; whilst in other miniatures we see the competing trouvères bareheaded, and dressed in the plain gowns of the bourgeoisie. It is, however, just as likely, if not more so, that the former were not necessarily nobles, but "crowned" trouvères; and that the latter were not necessarily bourgeois, but "uncrowned," viz., were candidates for the prize. However this may be, there is no doubt that such trouvères as Lambert Ferri, "le maire" or magistrate, Robert du Chastel, "le clerc" or scholar, Colart "le Bouteillier," and others having similar surnames indicating a profession or trade, belonged to the highly respectable and respected bourgeoisie. Nor need it be pointed out that between the two periods there is no distinct line of demarcation, and that the transition was very gradual indeed. Nevertheless, the evolution is interesting as a sign of the times, even in those early days, the more so as it coincided with a precisely analogous movement in Germany, where the aristocratic "Minnesänger," whose historical festival on the Wartburg took place in 1207,* were gradually superseded by the "Meistersänger," who flourished at the end of the thirteenth and the beginning of the fourteenth century, and whose sphere of life was exactly that of the bourgeois trouvères of Northern France and Flanders.

If, then, the Puy of Arras, at first essentially aristocratic, became, through time, more popular or democratic in its character, it became, on the other hand, also more academical. The nobles in those days, as is well-known, were not given to writing, and those who were poet-singers left the task of committing their compositions to paper to clerks or scholars belonging to the clergy or to the bourgeoisie; indeed, it was only among these latter that, with rare exceptions, the educated few—in the literary sense—were to be found. What, therefore, the Puy of Arras lost in aristocratic brilliancy, it gained in scholarship and literary ability; and it is in this respect that its second or more popular period was certainly superior to its more exclusive predecessor. Founded early in the eleventh century as a purely ecclesiastical institution or Court, it gradually lost its original character, until the religious ceremony was reduced to a mere matter of form as a preliminary to the secular festival. And how thoroughly secular these festivals had become as early as the beginning of the thirteenth century is strikingly illustrated by a song in which Villau d'Arras, a trouvère living at that time, addresses the assembly at the first meeting after the restoration of the Puy: †

Beau m'est del Pui que je vois restoré
Pour sostenir amour, joie, e jovent
Fu établis et de jolieté.‡

It was at the time of that restoration that the Puy of Arras began to take the lead among the other Puys of Northern France and Flanders, reaching the height of its glory about the middle of the thirteenth century, when it was graced by Jehan Bretel and his contemporaries, and sovereign princes, nobles, and middle-class scholars alike entered the arena as competitors for the prize, or formed part of the "High Court" or jury. Of the celebrity it attained, and of the high esteem in which its judgments were held throughout Artois, Picardy, and Flanders, the extant compositions of that time afford abundant evidence. "To the noble Company of the Puy," sings Robert du Chastel, the Scholar, "do I present my song, for I know of no company more worthy":

A la noble compaignie
Del Pui fais présent
De ma chançon, car ne sai meillour gent.§

"To the Puy of Arras," sings another trouvère, "shall I send my song, and I myself will go to sing it to the Court, and greet my love":

Au Pui d'Arras voeil mon chant envoier
Ou je l'irai méismes présenter
Pour ceulx du Puy, et amour saluer.‖

Again, we have Andrien Douche, the trouvère, who bids his song "fly to Arras, that those who well

* As Fétis has pointed out, Wagner, in making Tannhäuser appear at that festival, was guilty of—an excusable—anachronism, for that Minnesänger only flourished about eighty years later.

† Puy being, like Academy, used both in the abstract and the concrete, the "restoration" may either mean a revival of the institution after an interruption, owing perhaps to war, or it may refer to the festival, or, again, to the meeting hall.

know how to sing may hear his lay; for at the Puy of Arras sit the noble judges who will award the prize to the best of all our songs":

Chançon va t'en tout sans loisir,
Au Pui d'Arras te fai oïr,
A ceulx qui sevent chans fournir.
Là sont li bon entendeour
Ki jugeront bien la meillour
De nos chançons.*

Then there is Mahien de Gand, who sends his song to Bretel the President, that it may be sung at the festival:

Bretel, ma chançon envoie
Vos ai, por ce que soit oïe
Au Pui, devant la gent jolie.†

And that, even in those days, there were not wanting the heart-burnings of the trouvère who, disappointed at not gaining the coveted prize, roundly abused the Academicians of the Puy, and charged them with unduly favouring their own relations or persons of rank, is shown by the following interesting stanza of a song by Jehan de Renty:—"Were it not for the sake of singing in honour of my lady-love, nothing," vows the trouvère, "would induce me to compete at the Puy, where the prize is often awarded to those who, of composing or singing, know no more than the man in the moon."

Se che n'estoit pour ma dame honorer,
Jamais au Pui ne diroie chançon;
Car j'en voi cieux sovent l'oneur porter,
Ki de chanter ne sevent un boton.
Li juge font leur grant hontage,
Ki pour parens ki pour grant signorage
Donent à cieux le courone e l'onor,
Ki ne sevent trover ne ke pastour.‡

It will be seen from these eminently characteristic extracts that the compositions which were admitted to be sung at the festivals were always previously sent in to the authorities of the Puy, and, no doubt, the same rule was observed also in the case of the jeux partis, in as far at least as regards the prize question itself, that is to say, the first or challenging stanza, together with the air to which this and the following verses were to be sung. Sometimes the entire jeu parti was probably composed or arranged beforehand by the competing trouvères; but in the great majority of cases, the whole jeu parti was improvised, except the first stanza, embodying the prize question. It may be imagined that to keep up the argument in improvised rhyme, and at the same time to fit and sing it to a given air required, both in attack and defence, an extraordinary degree of readiness, repartee, and routine; and it was in this that trouvères like Bretel, Ferri, Grieviler, and others achieved their greatest triumphs. Nevertheless, it is to the solo songs that we must look as the real and crucial test of the musical and poetical merits of the trouvères, for these compositions, having to be sent in and approved beforehand, involved more depth, study, and preparation than the brilliant and dashing feats accomplished in a jeu parti.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By Joseph Bennett.

No. XX.—GLINKA (continued from page 80).

When an Emperor digs a composer in the ribs, and his courtiers of the bluest blood follow the Imperial example, the object of their attentions is in a position which the world generally agrees to consider fortunate. But a man's happiness is affected by many and complex causes. Glinka at Court was to be envied. From time to time the Empress would receive him on friendly terms, delighted to hear him play and sing; he was a favoured guest at State ceremonials, and every service he rendered secured an ample reward. In the composer's home, however, things wore a different aspect. There the long-standing troubles with his wife came to a head, ending in Madame Glinka's departure from her husband's house. Glinka's sensitive nature could hardly endure this mortification. For a month he remained shut up in his lonely rooms, cherishing a resolve never again to appear in public life. A first step towards carrying out this determination was actually made. On December 18, 1839, Glinka resigned his place as Director of the Imperial Chapel and severed his lucrative connection with the Court.

More reasonable ideas prevailed when time had blunted the keen edge of shame and, it may be, of self-reproach. The musician's art claimed him; he yielded to her mandate, and began the composition of a new opera, taking his subject from a metrical version, by Pouchkine, of an old national story—the story of "Russlan et Ludmila." According to this myth, Russlan espoused Ludmila, daughter of King Svétosar, and all went merry as a marriage bell till the wedded pair retired to the nuptial chamber. Then came a thunder crash; the room filled with a black vapour, and Russlan, on recovering from his fright, discovered that his bride had disappeared. Enraged at what he deemed the indifference or cowardice of Russlan in not guarding his prize better, Svétosar offered her hand to whomsoever should first find her. Four Knights undertook the quest, Russlan being one. Proceeding on his search, Russlan encountered a hermit, who informed him that Ludmila was a prisoner in the castle of Tchernomor, a powerful dwarf, the secret of whose invincibility lay in his long beard. The hermit also counselled Russlan to obtain a talismanic sword which lay in a certain place guarded by a giant's head. Russlan followed this advice. He won the sword in combat with its warden; attacked the dwarf, cut off his beard, and rescued the lady. After other adventures needless to relate, Russlan recovered the favour of his father-in-law, and was permitted to live in peace with his bride. This wild legend, although savouring much of the nursery, attracted Glinka's favourable notice, and he consulted Pouchkine with reference to a libretto founded upon it. The poet, at first unwilling, at last consented, and would probably have undertaken the book but for his untimely death in a duel with a young Frenchman, whom he suspected of being the lover of his wife. Under these circumstances, Glinka arranged the scenes himself, obtaining dialogue and lyrics from anybody able to supply them, and occasionally drawing upon his own resources as a versifier. Thus the libretto grew; Glinka meanwhile composing the music with furious energy, as in the case of "Life for the Czar." "It is needless to say," writes M. Fouque, "that the sceptical humour found in Pouchkine's poem does not enter into the opera. The composer looks gravely upon the sentimental side of the work; he renders—often admirably—the pathos or the poetry of the situations, being careful to mark each personage by accent, colour, or fashion of musical utterance. Ratmer, the Oriental Prince, sings languorous cantilena; the old sorcerer—a Finn, like all the sorcerers of Russian legend—sings a ballad of which the theme was gathered during an excursion along the Baltic shore; while Tchernomor, that Caliban of the Black Sea, is represented by a strange orchestral figure which marvellously depicts heaviness and stupidity. Certain scenes, for example the first and last, have a well marked Russian physiognomy, and to the sympathetic characters, Russlan and Ludmila, Glinka gives in profusion broad and charming melodies developed without constraint or preconceived ideas of form." We need not follow M. Fouque into his detailed account of the music, but it may be well to point out as a remarkable instance of realistic effect that, in the festal music of the opening scene, Glinka seeks to imitate the clatter of knives, forks, and plates by a special use of cymbals and triangles. He conceived the idea of this when attending a Court banquet in honour of an Imperial marriage. It should also be stated that the opera is full of national airs drawn from many countries and employed to distinguish the various characters in a musical sense.

"Russlan and Ludmila" was produced November 27, 1842, and Glinka himself has given an account of its reception:—"The first act went well; and the second also, save the chorus of the giants' heads. In the third Petrova was weak, the fourth made no effect; during the fifth the Imperial Family went away. The curtain fell; the composer received a 'call,' but the applause was not well sustained; on the stage and in the orchestra nobody troubled himself to hiss. I was undecided about showing myself, and consulted General Doubelt, who replied 'Go, of course; Christ suffered more than you.' However, my mother and I concealed our chagrin, and cordially entertained the friends we had invited to supper."

"Russlan and Ludmila" was performed seventeen times, but the public remained cold and indifferent. For this, Glinka was inclined to censure the representation. The actors were hostile, the orchestra careless, the mise-en-scène defective, and so on. But the well-known St. Petersburg musician, César Cui, had another explanation. He said: "Like most works in which the genius of a composer passes beyond the æsthetic faculties of his contemporaries, 'Russlan' was not appreciated at its true worth. It wearied the public or provoked jokes at its expense. 'The subject,' wrote one critic, 'is of little interest; as for the music, it is so strange and incomprehensible.' 'Russlan' was styled 'an abortive opera,' and if people went to see it, they did so only to admire the stage effects. Nothing less than the composer's death was wanted in order that justice might be done to this masterpiece. When, after several years, 'Russlan' was revived, the opera was received courteously, but without the least enthusiasm. But, at last, thanks to the persevering efforts of the young musical press, a reaction set in little by little, and now 'Russlan' is of all Russian operas the most esteemed. It is praised and revered; people almost bow before every note."

In the midst of his disappointment Glinka obtained some consolation from Liszt, who visited the Russian capital in 1842. "'Guillaume Tell,' when a novelty," said the great virtuoso, "was played sixteen times only." But no comfort of this kind could make up for a crowd of hostile criticisms; and, in a state of irritation and disgust, Glinka set out for Paris. There he was much observed, being accounted, perhaps, somewhat of a "rare bird" at a time when Russian composers were scarcely regarded as possible. M. Fouque has gathered a good deal of information from French sources concerning Glinka at this period, and it may not be amiss to quote a passage in which we get a clear view of him:—

"Before all, Glinka was that which we agree to call un homme distingué. His polite manners, and varied information; the care he took to avoid display, a total absence of pedantry, a minute observance of all the obligations attaching to social intercourse, denoted in him the perfect man of the world. His physiognomy was gentle and his bearing had the indescribable feline quality that characterises his race and gives to the women of his country an irresistible attraction. He spoke Russian, Italian, and French equally well, knew a little of German, and, after taking a few lessons in Paris, learned Spanish. He belonged, therefore, to the type of gentleman cosmopolite. But it was unnecessary to scratch the surface much in order to find the true Russian. The attraction of pleasure dominated his senses. At Paris he wasted six months with grisettes and low class actresses."

According to the same authority, Glinka cherished for his sovereign a reverence now out of fashion, even in Russia. He refused to witness Meyerbeer's "L'Etoile du Nord," because of the manner in which Peter the Great is treated, and a sure way to anger him was to advocate any change in the government of his native land. Sometimes his annoyance would express itself behind a mask of comedy. On one occasion, after a Moscow professor had advocated revolutionary ideas, Glinka knelt before an image of St. Nicholas and exclaimed, "O great saint, destroy the University of Moscow, destroy also that of Wilna, rather than there should be even a few men who talk like this man." More often he seriously resented radical ideas, and when, in his later years, constitutional nervousness increased, he would become so excited that visitors were cautioned to leave politics in the hall along with their umbrellas. As to music, on the other hand, Glinka preserved an open mind, and was always ready to consider novelty without prejudice. Bach and Handel were among his favourite masters, and he yielded to Beethoven the entire dominion of his soul. On first hearing "Fidelio" he wept, and on one occasion returned home from a concert looking so pale and agitated that his wife questioned him: "What is the matter?" "Beethoven," replied Glinka. "What has he done to you?" Instead of answering, the composer threw himself on a couch, buried his face in his hands, and remained a long while unable to articulate a word. He had just listened, for the first time, to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Glinka found himself, also, in keen sympathy with Berlioz, strengthened, no doubt, by the French master's personal fascination. The result was an indulgence in day dreams, which came to nothing, after the fashion of dreams in general. He, too, would write programme symphonies. A new world of achievement opened before him, and in fancy he saw himself entering it as a conqueror. How different this from the reality, since the remainder of his life was almost barren. M. Fouque speculates, in an interesting manner, upon the reason for this:—

"Probably Glinka doubted his own strength. He was at bottom an undecided man. We have marked his hesitations at the beginning of his career. The theatre having, in effect, given him more chagrin than pleasure, he eagerly welcomed an opportunity to exercise his powers upon another branch of the art. But he was no longer at the age when one dares, and, without doubt, timidity at that moment had the upper hand. We note in him a characteristic of the Russian temperament — an excessive modesty which approaches humility. The Russians are not, like the Germans, infatuated with themselves, their knowledge and their power, or, if so, they manage to hide the fact. On the contrary, they make themselves small, never speaking without respect of that which has been done by others, and expressing a desire to do as well. . . This disposition, admirable in some respects, becomes weakness when, as in Glinka's case, it paralyses the faculties, and stifles artistic initiative."

Glinka attracted but little notice during the first period of his Parisian sojourn. This, however, suited him. He went about as he liked in the gay city, and, it is to be feared, was not altogether wise in his pleasures. Presently some of his compatriots found him out, and a secretary of the Russian Embassy introduced him to Berlioz, who was just then contemplating a tour in the empire of the Czar. Berlioz received his brother composer with well nigh an excess of courtesy. Their meetings were frequent, and when, in 1845, the French master organised Festival Concerts in the Champs Elysées he did not forget to place some of Glinka's music in the programme. But all this is best told in the language of Glinka himself, who wrote as follows to a friend at home:—

"Chance has brought me into contact with some agreeable persons, and I have found friends in Paris, not a large number it is true, but sincere and full of talent. The most valuable acquaintance I have made is, without doubt, that of Hector Berlioz. To study and know his works, so decried by some, so admired by others, was one of the principal reasons for my coming to Paris. Fortune has amply favoured me. Not only have I heard the music of Berlioz at rehearsals and concerts, but I have entered into close relations with the composer, to my mind, the first of our age (in his line, of course), and I have become his friend as far as that is possible with a character so eccentric. Here take my opinion with regard to him."

"In the region of fancy nobody achieves such colossal inventions, and his combinations have, among other merits, that of being entirely new. Broad ensemble, ample details, close harmonic tissue, instrumentation powerful and till now unheard—such are the characteristics of the music of Berlioz. In drama, impelled by a fantastic temperament, he goes beyond the situation, misses the natural, and falls into the false. Among his works which I have heard, I like the best the overture to 'Les Francs Juges,' the 'Queen Mab' Scherzo, the Pilgrims' March of 'Childe Harold,' and the 'Dies Iræ' and 'Tuba mirum' of the 'Messe des Morts.' These things have made upon me an impression which I cannot describe. I now have in my possession the manuscripts of some unpublished works by Berlioz, which I study with unmixed pleasure."

After declaring that the orchestra of the Conservatoire Concerts was too good, because paying too much attention to detail, Glinka gives some particulars about the performance and reception of extracts from his works at the Berlioz Concerts, and continues thus:—

"I can say that I have obtained a passing success most important for me. Berlioz, Herz, and others have read my scores, and in the Débats has appeared a long article by Berlioz which will prove to you that my self-love as a composer ought to be satisfied. In short, I am very well content with my trip. Paris is a marvellous city. Its variety of intellectual pleasures is inexhaustible, and in all my life I cannot remember a period more enjoyable than the months I have spent here. From an artistic point of view, study of Berlioz's compositions, and experience of the Parisian public have led to important conclusions. I have resolved to strengthen my repertory by some concert pieces for orchestra—and if my strength permit, I will write many of them—in the form of Fantaisies pittoresques. Up to the present, instrumental music has been divided into two contrasted sections: quartets and symphonies, which, appreciated by a few, frighten the many by their complexity, and concertos, variations, &c., which fatigue the ear by their want of connection and the feeling of the listener for the trouble taken by the executant. It appears to me that one can conciliate the exigencies of art and the demands of our age, and, in turning to account the improvements in modern instruments and execution, write pieces agreeable alike to connoisseurs and the general public. I have already begun to work, and am writing a Coda to my 'Marche de Tchernomor.' The fragment has pleased here, but a Coda was necessary."

"In Spain, the originality of the national melodies will help me much as regards the Fantaisies I have in mind. I shall see when on the spot if it be possible to write an opera of a Spanish cast. In any case, I mean to translate my impressions into music."

Glinka carried out his purpose of visiting Spain in June, 1845, his departure from Paris being described as that of a composer whose elegant music and distinction of style had conquered an enviable place in the opinion of connoisseurs. With regard to the article by Berlioz mentioned above, it will suffice to quote a single passage: "The talent of Glinka is essentially supple and varied; his style has the rare faculty of transforming itself, at the will of the composer, according to the exigencies and character of the subject in hand. He can be simple and even naïve without descending to the use of commonplace means. His melodies have unexpected accents and phrases of a strange charm. He is a great harmonist and writes for instruments with a care and knowledge of their subtlest resources which makes his orchestra one of the newest and most piquant that one can hear."

Glinka's trip to Spain had no such artistic results as he anticipated, but two of the promised Fantaisies pittoresques being written. These are now known as "Jota aragonesa" and "Une Nuit à Madrid." The composer's health probably had much to do with the barrenness of his last years. M. Fouque describes him as suffering from an insurmountable apathy, nervous excitability, hypochondriacal humours, and constant indecision. These symptoms are well known, and their causes are not difficult to imagine, but they had, in Glinka's case, an effect especially regrettable in depriving him of further power to use his graceful talent. The composer was fertile enough in schemes. He formed resolution after resolution to do great things, but went no further than resolve. The springs of action were broken, and the machine would not work. Glinka, however, continued to move about, and, in 1848, was at Warsaw, where he had a curious encounter with the Governor, Prince Paskiewitch, a famous military bully of the day, and a soldier to whom Messrs. Barclay and Perkins' draymen would probably have awarded the treatment meted out to Marshal Haynau could they have got hold of him. Glinka tells the Paskiewitch story himself:—"He (the Governor) was out riding, followed by an escort of Cossacks. On seeing him I took off my cap, but Pedro (a companion and friend), who did not recognise the Prince, took no notice. Upon that, his Serenity dashed towards us and nearly upset me. In a rage, and not caring to risk new explosions of a temper so little regulated, I made arrangements to leave Warsaw. But, being ill and unable to travel, I remained a while longer. During this time the Prince learned who I was, and wished to make amends for his brutal act. He several times invited me to dinner, gave me always the best reception, placed me by his side, and poured out for me the Kakhetie wine which I liked so much. Sometimes he begged me to conduct his orchestra."

Four years later Glinka again set out for Spain, but turned back on reaching the Pyrenees and went to Paris, perhaps to study the scores of Gluck, with whose music he was then infatuated. Encountering Meyerbeer in the French capital, and never having witnessed an opera by the reformer of the eighteenth century, he asked the composer of "Les Huguenots" whether Gluck made an effect on the stage. Meyerbeer evidently thought such ignorance as this should be corrected: "I will write to Berlin, and request the director of the Court Theatre to play a Gluck opera when next you are passing through. Four such are always ready, and can be put on at a day's notice. You shall choose, and say whether you would like to hear 'Alceste,' 'Armide,' or either of the 'Iphigenies.'" Meyerbeer kept his word, and, on returning to Russia viâ Berlin, Glinka had the satisfaction of witnessing a performance of "Armide." He says thereanent:—"The effect of that music upon the stage went beyond my expectations. The scene in the garden was enchanting—seductive to the limits of possibility."

Time went on, but Glinka did nothing. His indecision and want of steady purpose stood between him and achievement. An opera, "La Bigame," was begun and laid aside, and the only fruit of the period appears to be a "Kyrie eleison" in three parts, composed for a neighbouring convent. This marked the existence of another "craze." He would now study ecclesiastical music, and (April, 1856) started for Berlin again to put himself under Dehn, and follow from the beginning the new course his wayward fancy had marked out. There, for the present, we must leave him.

MR. ROBERT BROWNING'S LATEST WORDS ON MUSIC.

Readers of those interesting essays published recently by M. Saint-Saëns will remember with what energy he assails men of letters for meddling with musical criticism, and dispensing their patronage and censure on works which they are in many cases obviously incapable of understanding. This charge he not only makes, but substantiates, and what is true of France is equally true of England. Some of the greatest writers of modern times—George Eliot, for example—have blundered grossly in their allusions to music. But under this condemnation one notable figure in the world of letters has never fallen, and that is Mr. Browning. We may blame him for his terrible obscurity—even so sympathetic a critic as the Dean of St. Paul's admits that nothing can be made of "Sordello" "without more trouble than we usually expect to be called upon to give to any book but one of high mathematics"—for his crabbedness of construction, and for his harshness of metre (How on earth is one to scan such a line as "Wagner, Dvorák, Liszt, — to where — trumpets, shawms!"); but it is impossible to accuse him of ignorance or lack of respect in his treatment of music. An irreverent friend has suggested that if he made his meaning perfectly plain, he would probably expose his inaccuracy, and that, like a cuttle-fish, he prefers to escape by shrouding himself in impenetrable darkness. But this suggestion savours of prejudice, and, speaking seriously, we have good reason for confidence in Mr. Browning's knowledge of detail, while we readily recognise his wonderfully fine psychological insight into the problems which music is so specially fitted to solve. The title of his new volume, as most of our readers are aware, is "Parleyings with certain people of importance in their day," and the "parleying" with which we are particularly concerned is that addressed to Charles Avison. Here let us frankly confess that until we saw the name on Mr. Browning's title-page we had never heard of this musician. On turning to Grove's Dictionary we discovered, in the brief notice which is there devoted to him, that he was born at Newcastle-on-Tyne in 1710, visited Italy, studied under Geminiani, and became Organist at his native town, where he died in 1770. We also learned that he was the author of "An Essay on Musical Expression," in which Marcello (whose Psalms he edited) and Geminiani are extolled to the disparagement of Handel, and that he published several concertos, quartets, trios, and sonatas. But neither in his lifetime nor in the hundred and seventeen years that have elapsed since his death can he be said to have achieved a reputation justifying his inclusion in the category of "people of importance." However, it is not for us to quarrel with Mr. Browning on this score. We are not so much interested in Avison or his "March," which is printed on p. 220 of the volume, and which—

> Timed, in Georgian years,
> The step precise of British Grenadiers

as in the remarks which the poet lets fall on the capacity and evolution of music. And these are in many ways remarkable, amounting as they do to the admission—unique in the mouth of a poet—that music is a more faithful reflex of humanity than poetry, sculpture, or painting—

> I state it thus:
> There is no truer truth obtainable
> By man than comes of music.

The most important passage is the following, from which we gather that while music goes nearer to the mark than any of her sister arts, she can never yet achieve absolute success, and that it is an inevitable law of progress that the developments, introduced by successive generations of composers, renders it impossible for us to find our aspirations and feelings so completely expressed in the music of the past as our ancestors did:—

> To match and mate
> Feeling with knowledge—make as manifest
> Soul's work as Mind's work, turbulence as rest,
> Hates, loves, joys, woes, hopes, fears, that rise and sink
> Ceaselessly, passion's transient flit and wink,
> A ripple's tinting or a spume-sheet's spread
> Whitening the wave,—to strike all this life dead,
> Run mercury into a mould like lead,
> And henceforth have the plain result to show—
> How we Feel, hard and fast as what we Know—
> This were the prize and is the puzzle!—which > Music essays to solve; and here's the hitch
> That baulks her of full triumph else to boast.
> All Arts endeavour this, and she the most > Attains thereto, yet fails of touching: why?
> Does Mind get Knowledge from Art's ministry?
> What's known once is known ever: Art's arrange,
> Dissociate, re-distribute, interchange
> Part with part, lengthen, broaden, high or deep
> Construct their bravest,—still such pains produce
> Change, not creation: simply what lay loose
> At first lies firmly after, what design
> Was faintly traced in hesitating line
> Once on a time, grows firmly resolute
> Henceforth and evermore. Now, could we shoot
> Liquidity into a mould,—some way
> Arrest Soul's evanescent moods, and keep > Unalterably still the forms that leap
> To life for once by help of Art!—which yearns
> To save its capture: Poetry discerns,
> Painting is 'ware of passion's rise and fall,
> Bursting, subsidence, intermixture—all
> A-seethe within the gulf. Each Art a-strain
> Would stay the apparition,—nor in vain:
> The poet's word-mesh, Painter's sure and swift > Colour-and-line-throw—proud the prize they lift!
> . . . . . Outdo
> Both of them, Music! Dredging deeper yet
> Drag into day,—by sound, thy master-net,—
> The abysmal bottom-growth, ambiguous thing
> Unbroken of a branch, palpitating
> With limbs' play and life's semblance! There it lies
> Marvel and mystery, of mysteries
> And marvels, most to love and laud thee for!
> Save it from chance and change we most abhor

Give momentary feeling permanence,
So that thy capture hold, a century hence,
Truth's very heart of truth as, safe to-day,
The Painter's Eve, the Poet's Helena
Still rapturously bend, afar still throw
The wistful gaze! Thanks, Homer, Angelo!
Could Music rescue thus from Soul's profound,
Give feeling immortality by sound,
Then, were she queenliest of Arts! Alas—
As well expect the rainbow not to pass!
"Praise 'Radaminta'—love attains therein
To perfect utterance! Pity—what shall win
Thy secret like 'Rinaldo?'"—so men said:
Once all was perfume—now, the flower is dead—
They spied tints, sparks have left the spar! Love, hate,
Joy, fear, survive,—alike importunate
As ever to go walk the world again,
Nor ghost-like pant for outlet all in vain
Till Music loose them, fit each filmily
With form enough to know and name it by
For any recognizer sure of ken
And sharp of ear, no grosser denizen
Of earth than needs be. Nor to such appeal
Is Music long obdurate: off they steal—
How gently, dawn-doomed phantoms! back come they Full-blooded with new crimson of broad day—
Passion made palpable once more. Ye look
Your gaze on Handel? Gaze your first on Gluck!
Why wistful search, O waning ones, the chart
Of stars for you while Haydn, while Mozart
Occupies heaven? These also, fanned to fire
Flamboyant wholly,—so perfections tire,— Whiten to wanness, till . . . let others note
The ever-new invasion!

The February number of Longman's Magazine contains a curious paper entitled "On Melody in Speech" from the pen of Mr. Weber, the resident organist of the German Chapel Royal, St. James's Palace. The prefatory portion is devoted to a consideration of the sounds of Nature, most of which, according to the writer, are "melodious and harmonious, and form exact intervals and chords." Thus Mr. Weber has noted down two melodies heard at different times performed by the wind, while the "solemn strains and most perfect ideal harmonies" of the telegraph wires are compared by him to Æolian harps. Furthermore, "all animals on land, quadrupeds and bipeds, have their characteristic voices and calls in distinct (?) intervals"—dogs and cats in fifths, donkeys in octaves, horses in semitones down the chromatic scale. Here Gardiner, the stocking-weaver of Leicester, and author of the "Music of Nature," has been before Mr. Weber, for he noted down "the whole concert of the groves," as Mr. Rowbotham gracefully calls it; but as the present writer has not mentioned what were the birds whose melodies he has noted down, we have been unable to compare the two versions. The main body of Mr. Weber's observations relate to the human voice in speaking. "We speak," he says, "in melodies and harmonies, improvising them by the impulse of our thoughts and feelings over an extent or compass of one and a half to two octaves. . . . and from the quality and accent of this musical investment, the truth and sincerity of the words may be felt, and the character of the speaker be traced." Then after noticing, with illustrations, the progression most commonly used in speaking—viz., from the dominant to the keynote—he adds "common conversation is generally held in the major mode and in the same key," but "an unfriendly reply is mostly in an unrelated key. . . . Every person has his own fundamental and favourite key in which he generally speaks, but which he often transposes higher or lower in sympathy to other voices, and when he is excited." He then proceeds to give a good many illustrations of conversations, the keys of B flat, B, or C being those most commonly used in ordinary conversation. At Boulogne and Rheims he noticed that the people generally spoke in B flat major and minor, and adds (the italics are ours) "The large bells at the belfry at Boulogne and at the cathedral at Rheims also have the low B flat, and may have been cast in that tone to be in unison with the voice of the people." A good many more illustrations follow of dialogues in French, calls of railway guards and conductors, &c., the superior melodiousness of which in France calls forth his admiration. Further examples are given of the cries of native 'bus conductors and paper boys, from which we gather that the busier they are, the higher is the key employed. "Some of the cries of vendors in the streets" strike Mr. Weber as "quite beautiful and touching," and suggest to him that "a collection of such melodious and pleasant cries from towns in England and abroad would be most interesting in showing the musical talent and taste of the people who invent and use them." Such a remark as the foregoing just serves to illustrate the unfruitful nature of such fanciful speculations. By Mr. Weber's own showing the French have particularly melodious cries; is he therefore, as a German, prepared to admit this fact as a proof of their superior musical organisation? And has he not unconsciously laid greater stress than the facts warrant upon the distinctness of the intervals observed in our speech or in the sounds of nature? We should be very anxious to know whether a series of independent experiments would confirm the statements we have quoted above. Will some of our readers try, and communicate the result?

Madame Adelina Patti's present manager is, conceivably, a cute person. No sooner was a clumsy "infernal machine" discovered under the seat of a "crank"—Anglice, cracked—individual in the gallery than the wires were loaded with messages reporting an attempt to kill the prima donna. Of course the real facts soon came out, but, meanwhile, there had been universal sympathy with the great singer. If the manager had a hand in working this, he deserves to be congratulated. We hope that the example will not spread, but we do so almost against hope. Perhaps we may hear before long that the cellars of Madame Nilsson's house have been searched for dynamite and that Colonel Henry Mapleson has engaged detectives from Scotland Yard to "shadow" Madame Marie Roze. These are times of keen competition.

A large number of the friends and admirers of the late Mr. Joseph Maas visited West Hampstead Cemetery, on the 20th ult., to inspect the monument raised by public subscription to his memory. The "unveiling" took place without the formal proceedings and speech-making which had once been contemplated. These were, on second thoughts, deemed unadvisable, and, as a matter of fact, there could have been no better tribute to the deceased artist than the gathering in silence around his grave. The monument, designed by Mr. James Currie, of Oxford Street, represents Music as a classic female figure, leaning in grief upon a pedestal, and contemplating a medallion portrait of the late tenor. In her left hand she carries a lyre, one string of which is broken. The inscription states that the memorial has been raised "by friends and admirers, in memory of a great singer and a good man." We may add that the amount contributed to the memorial fund was £558, and that there remains, after paying for the monument and defraying incidental expenses, the sum of £298. This has been so invested as to produce £10 per annum, which amount will be offered, year by year in perpetuity, as a "Joseph Maas Prize," to be competed for by the students (tenor vocalists) at some public school of music, the school to be selected by the trustees, who now are Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mr. Joseph Bennett, Mr. G. H. Johnstone, and Mr. Charles Lyall.

There is, or was some days ago, an opening for a musician in the North Country. It appears to have been advertised only in the local papers, but that, no doubt, sufficed to bring a crowd of applicants, though we could have wished a wider publicity for the sake of many all over England who would have felt their ambition aroused and pride in their art greatly gratified. The facts are these:—Durham County Asylum fell short of an attendant; we should say through death, since no less powerful cause would be likely to create a vacancy. Under these circumstances the managers bethought them that it might be well to secure the services of a gentleman able to combine the ordinary duties of the position with the special and grateful task of amusing the patients. As to the form of amusement, they were not rigorously particular. Professors of legerdemain, of ground and lofty tumbling, or of spiritualistic phenomena were not absolutely ineligible, but, on the whole, the managers preferred a "musician"—a compliment to the divine art and to the profession which many of our readers will warmly appreciate. In return they offered "£30 a year, paid monthly, rising, according to ability, to £45, with board, lodging, washing, and uniform." Before the reader bursts out in laudation of such princely generosity, it is advisable he should know that the managers attached a third duty to the post—that of sweeping the asylum chimneys—a mere detail, of course, though a dirty one. Where would the musician be in this combination of turnkey, artist, and sweep? and how would a man, covered with the soot of the third, maintain the classic purity of the second? Scores of musicians, believing in the power of their art under all circumstances, might have wished to test this case. We hope one such has obtained the post and will, in due time, give us his experience.

The Times is not altogether a fortunate paper, and in the roll of blunders connected with the press it cuts a prominent and distinctly unhappy figure. At the present moment our contemporary is a victim to sub-editorial incompetence. For example, it had, some days ago, to record the death of Frederic Lablache, and, in the course of a few lines, it described the great Lablache as a tenor, invented a contemporary singer whom it called Vavanti, and knighted Michael Balfe. This was pretty well for a beginning in the musical department. That sub-editor should be encouraged. He will do wonders by-and-bye.

Dr. Stainer has been elected a member of the Athenæum Club, by virtue of the rule which empowers the Committee to elect nine persons annually on the ground of "distinguished eminence in literature, science, or the arts, or for public services."

Mr. Barnby having resigned the position of Conductor of the London Musical Society, Dr. Mackenzie has consented to conduct the practices and Concert for the present season.

VERDI'S "OTELLO."

(From our Special Correspondent.)

The long-expected new opera of Giuseppe Verdi was produced at La Scala, Milan, on the 5th ult., after one or two postponements, caused, ostensibly, by the illness of the tenor, Tamagno, who had been cast for the title character. Before touching upon the performance and its attendant circumstances, we will try to give the reader some idea of the work itself; and, first, as to the libretto, founded on Shakespeare's play, by Arrigo Boito, composer of "Mefistofele."

One might fancy that, before laying out his "argument," Boito took up the book of Rossini's "Otello," in order to do that which its author had not done, and leave undone that which he actually accomplished. There is not much of Shakespeare in the earlier work, where imaginary events connected with the marriage of Otello and Desdemona occupy a great deal of space, and where, moreover, the scene is laid wholly in Venice. Boito, on the other hand, keeps closely to the play, and is even guided by the language of the English poet. In saying this, we must not be supposed to imply that every scene in Shakespeare's "Otello" is reproduced in the opera. Boito, in point of fact, has made only a selection, but whatever he has taken re-appears with commendable fidelity to the original. The first act of the drama is ignored altogether; hence the loss of the fine scene in which Otello defends himself before the Venetian senate. But, in giving this up, the librettist exercised a wise discretion. Had he retained it he must have curtailed elsewhere, and weakened his exposition of the motives leading to the catastrophe. As the book now stands it shows the complete unity which every operatic libretto should possess. It begins with the birth of Otello's jealousy, it follows the growth of that passion, and ends with its fatal results. Nothing could be better, however much we might have liked to hear "Most noble, grave, and reverend seigneurs," declaimed to Verdi's music, amid the pomp and splendour of olden Venice. Before describing the course of the "argument" act by act, let us say that the characters are Otello, Iago, Cassio, Roderigo, Ludovico, Montano, a Herald, Desdemona, and Emilia, Bianca being eliminated altogether, as is sometimes done in English acting versions of the original drama. The Duke and Brabantio, of course, disappear with the rejected first act.

When the curtain rises we witness the landing of Otello in Cyprus amid a tempest ominous of his fortunes. The Moor is received by Iago, Roderigo, Cassio, Montano, and a miscellaneous crowd, who make great rejoicing and sing festive choruses in his honour. Otello leaves the stage—note that Desdemona has not yet appeared—and the drinking scene at once begins, leading up to the struggle between Roderigo and Cassio, the re-appearance of Otello, and the dismissal of Cassio from the service of his chief. As the Moor investigates the cause of the disturbance, Desdemona enters. What follows is very happily contrived. Seeing his wife, Otello exclaims: "Che? . . . la mia dolce Desdemona anch' essa per voi distolta da' suoi sogni! Cassio, non sei più capitano." Hearing this, Cassio lets fall his sword, which Iago picks up and hands to an attendant, murmuring "Oh, mio trionfo!" The stage is then left to Otello and Desdemona, who sing the necessary love-duet, for which Boito is entirely responsible. At its close, as the enraptured pair move off, Venus shining in the clear sky above them, we hear the Moor say, "Un bacio, un bacio, ancora un bacio." We shall hear him repeat the words by-and-bye, under very different circumstances.

The second act is laid in a hall of the castle, opening, through wide doors, to a garden at the back. A short interview takes place between Iago and Cassio relative to the proposed intercession of Desdemona in favour of the dismissed lieutenant, and then the Ancient, left alone, utters a sinister and cynical soliloquy strongly suggestive of the author's Mefistofele. Desdemona and Emilia appear in the garden; Cassio joins them, and, when Otello enters, Iago, directing his attention to the scene, begins his poisonous work. Soon comes a pretty contrast. Children, women, and mariners of Cyprus enter the garden bearing offerings to Desdemona, and singing songs in her praise.

As this charming episode concludes, and the people move away, Desdemona and Emilia come forward into the hall. Then we have the young wife's pleading for Cassio, Otello's angry refusal, the incident of the dropped handkerchief, and the exit of the discomfited women. The dialogue of Otello and Iago at once resumes, going on to the end of the act, which closes with the oath to take revenge.

In the third act the stage represents the great hall of the castle, opening into another apartment of smaller proportions. Otello and Iago are discovered, to whom a herald enters announcing the approach of Venetian ambassadors. We are soon led to infer that the official has disturbed a conversation on the old subject. Otello remarks "Continua," and the Ancient warns him to observe Cassio, and not forget the handkerchief. Iago quits the stage as Desdemona enters, leaving all clear for the terrible dialogue which ensues between the husband and wife. Next in order comes the artful talk of Iago with Cassio on the subject of Bianca, only a part of which, and that most confirmatory of his suspicions, is permitted to reach Otello, as he listens behind a pillar. The act ends with the arrival of ambassadors headed by Ludovico, in whose presence the infuriated Moor heaps insults upon his wife and, as she is led away by the Venetian noble, flings after her a curse that horrifies the onlookers and contrasts strangely with the Vivas of the crowd outside. Overcome with passion, Otello falls senseless upon the stage, now clear of everybody but himself and Iago, who, mocking the shouts of the populace and pointing scornfully to the prostrate Moor, exclaims, "Ecco il Leone!"

The fourth act takes place in Desdemona's chamber, where are seen the doomed wife and her attendant. Here the dialogue keeps close to Shakespeare, and we have in due course the story of Barbara and her Willow Song. Emilia retires, while Desdemona, before seeking repose, kneels to a statue of the Madonna, and offers up a prayer alike for the guilty and the innocent. The murder scene follows without variation upon the original, and only at the close does Boito permit himself to depart therefrom. Apparently he objects to a scene of carnage on the stage, or else he would accentuate the death of Desdemona and Otello by submitting them alone to such a fate. Be this as it may, Emilia escapes unharmed by her husband, and Iago is dragged off, a prisoner, before Otello can get at him. The curtain falls for the last time as, in the agony of death, the Moor, throwing himself upon the body of Desdemona, again exclaims, "Un bacio, un bacio, ancora un bacio."

The reader will probably agree with us that Boito has done all that was possible with a subject not the best adapted for operatic purposes. It is difficult, in a lyric drama, to deal with psychological processes needing to be set forth fully; and Shakespeare's play, however regarded, imposes upon the librettist a long series of dialogues exceedingly trying to the musician. Given the propriety of choosing "Otello" at all, then Boito is entitled to well nigh unqualified praise. We now proceed to indicate the leading features of the music, act by act.

There is no orchestral prelude. After three bars of storm music, the curtain rises, and the drama begins. The storm music is conventional throughout, and to its exigencies the declaimed phrases of the dialogue submit themselves as a matter of course. Here and there an effective choral outburst takes place, and a prayer, "Dio, fulgor della bufera," massively harmonised in the simplest form of counterpoint, produces a great effect. Otherwise, the opening scene is chiefly noticeable for its abounding energy. It shows that the composer has lost none of his verve, and that he can grip his subject as firmly as ever. Otello has no aria d'entrata, nor throughout the work does the composer introduce any feature merely for the sake of tradition. While asserting the claims of his art, he respects also those of the associated drama. The dignified soldier declaims a few appropriate words, and passes off the stage, leaving the assembled crowd to indulge in choral rejoicings. These include two capital numbers "Evviva! Vittoria," and "Fuoco di gioia," which are as formally constructed as any in the master's earlier works. They have a beginning, a middle, and an end; and can be lifted out of the opera to be treated as detached pieces musically complete in themselves. So far, they are representative of others to follow; and at once proclaim the fact that wherever the progress of the drama allows a musical form to be developed, Verdi seizes the opportunity. In such places the art of music comes to the front, as is its right. The choruses just noticed are separated by a good deal of dialogue set to declamatory phrases singularly happy in character. Verdi is a master of musical declamation, and he takes care not to lessen its force by excessive orchestral accompaniment. At all times the spoken word has a first claim upon attention. But even in the dialogue, he takes advantage of such chances as favour cantilena; many of the most beautiful ideas in the work being thus presented, and made to light up the progress of scenes in which there is necessarily much talk. The Drinking Scene has also a set movement, consisting of solo (divided between Iago and Cassio) and chorus. This is in verse or strophe form; precisely the same music occurring again and again, though to different words. The master, it seems, is not afraid of being thought antiquated, and he invests the old form with fresh interest by means of highly characteristic music—character, bien entendu, being gained without sacrifice of pleasing and well-balanced melody. This will always be a favourite number, and is important enough for separate use in the concert-room. Space does not allow us to enlarge upon the long spell of declamation connected with the quarrel of Roderigo and Cassio. Enough that it partakes of the character indicated above. We pass on to the love duet with which the act ends, and note with unalloyed pleasure an extended and beautifully expressive scene, wherein pure vocal melody is set off by richly coloured, yet never obtrusive, accompaniments. Save for greater freedom of harmonic treatment, we see nothing here inconsistent with the Verdi whom all the world knows. The familiar hand of the master is clearly shown, though the duet undoubtedly exemplifies the liberty of modern practice—liberty, not licence, which Verdi in this case ever avoids.

Hitherto we have encountered no Leitmotiven and we shall meet with none in the future, though once or twice a theme before employed is repeated, not in a representative so much as in a suggestive capacity. But Verdi does not neglect characterisation, and he is always happy when Cassio comes on the stage, the music then assuming a lightness and grace the fitness of which is instinctively recognised. So in the opening dialogue of this act, where the qualities just named serve to heighten by contrast the effect of Iago's Mephistophelian soliloquy. A broad unison theme, of rugged energy, here typifies the Ancient's confession of faith: "Credo in un Dio crudel, che m'ha creato simile a sè, e che nell ira io nomo." The soliloquy is, of course, not an air, but a powerful piece of declamation, taking its varied character strictly from the verbal text; the whole number standing for, perhaps, the most "advanced" feature in the work. It gives an artist skilled in declamation such an opportunity as few lyric dramas afford. At its close, the lighter music resumes; so passing on to that of the Garden fête, where again we have charming concerted pieces of a popular character, and modelled upon familiar forms. Verdi has written few more pleasing things than the full chorus "Dove guardi splendono raggi," in which the bass swings constantly from tonic to dominant and back again; or than the chorus in which girls have an independent theme above the music of the other voices. To both the drone of the cornemuse or the tinkle of the mandolin gives characteristic effects that heighten their charm. The rest of the act is much taken up with declaimed dialogue, relieved, however, by a quartet for Desdemona, Emilia, Otello, and Iago, which, like that in "Rigoletto," may best be described as a double duet, so distinctly separate from the music of the Moor and his wife being that of Emilia and her husband. The quartet is difficult of execution, and, though a notable effort, will certainly never rival its predecessor in the favour of the public. In the long dialogue for Otello and Iago, with which the act ends, Verdi takes care to seek relief by interposing as many cantilena passages as the words will allow. Some of these are remarkable for their beauty. Such is the Andantino, "Era la notte"—a delightful bit of pure harmony and melody. The ensemble at the end, heavily scored and of strenuous force, better suggests the Verdi of early days than any other section in the work.

As regards the features just named, it might figure in "Trovatore" or "La Forza del Destino."

In the third act we find, after some introductory matter, another beautiful duet for Otello and Desdemona. "Dio, ti giocondi, O sposo" runs over with pure melody, placed where it should be—in the voice part. The form of the number is irregular; one short movement following another, and taking its character and significance from the text; but best of all is the first, the lovely theme of which haunts the ear long after the sounds have died away. This, however, has a formidable rival in a passage sung later by Desdemona, as a pathetic appeal to her suspicious husband. It is by means of such resort to cantilena, we say again, that Verdi preserves his dialogues from monotony. The vocal melodies come in a most refreshing manner, with a distinct musical interest, and they illustrate, we think, the happy compromise between the claims of music and of drama which the entire work conspicuously exemplifies. Passing over much that is graceful in the dialogue for Iago and Otello, as coming under a description already pointed out, we reach the great and prolonged ensemble, beginning with the appearance of Ludovico and his fellow ambassadors. This opens with all the pomp imaginable; trumpets on and off the stage adding their brazen clangour to the noise of voices and orchestra. It includes, as may be supposed, a great number of solo passages, intense in expression and exciting in character, these leading up to a concerted piece for chorus and seven solo voices, in which Verdi puts forth all his power of combination. With so many parts, most of them acting independently, it is difficult to secure the broad effects needful in such a piece, and we are not sure that Verdi has quite succeeded. But the ensemble will always rank amongst the most elaborate, and, in certain respects, the most masterly, connected with the lyric stage. Regarded as the work of a man seventy-three years old, its sustained energy and forceful utterance are phenomenal.

The last act will, perhaps, commend itself everywhere as musically the most beautiful. So it ought to do. Every situation on the stage, and every line in the poetry, call for music with an imperative voice, and appeal irresistibly to a composer's instinct. As the curtain rises upon Desdemona's chamber, the cor Anglais takes up a plaintive strain, presently used in the Willow Song. This is developed at some length, with infinite pathos, and so the mind is prepared for the touching scene to follow. After a short dialogue for Desdemona and Emilia, founded upon the matter of the Introduction, the Willow Song is reached, and at once attention fixes itself upon music as affecting as any ever heard in a theatre. The melody has a character as marked as a national tune, and may, indeed, be an imitation of some Italian musical patois. Anyhow, it is very striking and beautiful. Verdi here adopts the verse form, but with considerable variation in accompaniment; each repetition of the melody thus presenting itself with fresh interest. At the close of the song, Emilia takes her leave, and Desdemona, left alone, sings the "Ave Maria," beginning with recitative on a single note, accompanied by sustained chords, and passing on to a plain and most moving cantilena. Verdi here shows that he rightly estimates the power of simple music. Nothing could be less pretentious than this beautiful strain, and nothing could be more affecting. When first heard at Milan it brought tears to many eyes. Desdemona presently sleeps, and Otello enters at the back of the stage; standing there, a sinister figure, while the double-basses execute the solo of which every amateur has by this time heard. As he bends over and kisses the woman he is about to kill, the orchestral melody first used at the close of the duet in Act I. re-appears; then Desdemona wakes, and the murder scene begins. Verdi does not prolong this unduly. Founding his music for the most part upon a fragment of the double-bass solo, he makes it so forcible that he can afford to pass rapidly on to the catastrophe, and thence to the end. As dramatic music, this Finale takes the highest rank. It strikes us as the very feelings of the characters expressed in ordered sound, and it intensifies the situation to a most painful degree. The last bars are most touching of all, for in them, as Otello embraces the body of his wife, re-appears the expressive kiss theme heard first at the moment of their highest happiness. Upon this suggestive reminiscence the curtain finally descends. Our opinion of the work, as a whole, may easily be gathered from the foregoing remarks. To us it exemplifies judicious consideration for dramatic propriety without sacrifice of musical effect, and we must place it among Verdi's finest efforts—in some important respects, at the head of all.

The occasion of the performance was a remarkable one. Repeated delays had intensified interest rather than abated it, and "all the city was moved" because of the opera. The hotels filled with strangers who had secured seats, and others who had come on the chance of obtaining admission; everywhere "Otello" was talked about; the press, annoyed at being shut out from rehearsals, kept up an agitation, and the man who could let out any of the well-guarded secrets of La Scala became for the time a hero. Meanwhile Verdi, superintending the many rehearsals, pursued the even tenour of his way, calm and undisturbed. Visiting nobody, and allowing nobody to visit him, the master reserved all his energy for duty. Rising early each morning, he took a little exercise in the quiet streets; spent most of the day at the theatre, and about ten o'clock went to bed. On the memorable Saturday evening, a crowd gathered before the Hotel de Milan to see him pass to his carriage. This was the beginning of an extraordinary series of demonstrations. A far larger crowd around the theatre cheered Verdi in confident anticipation of an artistic triumph; while within the house and during the performance of the opera, the old composer was summoned at every possible opportunity. So long as the curtain remained up the brilliant gathering let him alone, but whenever it was down they kept him exercised at coming forward, bowing, and retiring. Several times after each act two of the principal artists would lead him on, and then, perhaps by way of suggestion that he had had enough of it, Verdi would step forward alone, hat in hand, with his frock coat tightly buttoned around him. For this the audience reserved their loudest and longest cheer. They became frantic with enthusiasm. At the close there was a special scene of wreaths and flowers and what not appropriate to such occasions, but the master preserved his calm demeanour. Agitated he must surely have been, though not a muscle of his face moved, and he appeared as the most unconcerned person in all that delirious assembly. Another ovation awaited Verdi outside, where the constant crowd had become larger and denser. No horses should draw him home that night, but rather the willing arms of his enthusiastic countrymen. The design was fulfilled to the letter, and being able to regulate the pace of the carriage, the people gave their hero an embarrassing example of slow travelling. However, even such a journey must have an end. Verdi reached his hotel, the corridors of which were crowded, and, gaining his apartments, went speedily to bed, where, if he slept, it was not because his lingering admirers in the street failed to make a noise. So ended one of the greatest personal triumphs ever awarded to a composer.

Regarding the performance we need not speak at length, the matter being of comparatively small interest to English readers. The parts were thus distributed—Otello, Signor Tamagno; Iago, M. Maurel; Cassio, Signor Paroli; Roderigo, Signor Fornari; Ludovico, Signor Navarrini; Montano, Signor Limonta; Desdemona, Signora Pantaleoni; Emilia, Signora Petrovich. Taking the cast as a whole, it could not be called very strong. Tamagno had happy moments, and Maurel was excellent in every capacity, easily carrying off first honours. The comparatively small parts of Cassio and Roderigo were also well filled. On the other hand, the Desdemona might easily have been a better actress and singer. In the closing scene, Signora Pantaleoni rose more nearly to the level of her task, but there was always a good deal to desire. So with Signora Petrovich, whom, once or twice, the audience showed a disposition to treat irreverently. Putting Maurel aside, it was grievous to observe how little the performers seemed to know of good singing—now a well-nigh lost art upon the lyric stage, thanks to symphonic orchestras and declamatory composers. "Otello" was superbly mounted, the dresses, scenery, and appointments having been prepared with great care, and at much cost. But the storm scene was puerile. The smallest provincial theatre in England would have been ashamed to present it. With regard to the orchestra and chorus, much might be said of a mixed character. Taking the second as efficient, some of the work done by the first was unaccountably bad. The interlude for double-basses alone suffered from false intonation, and one wrong entry. On the other hand, many parts of the Opera were accompanied in a style worthy the repute of Signor Faccio's band. As to the verdict of the audience regarding "Otello," sufficient indication has been given. The "Ayes" had it on the question of complete acceptance, for there were no "Noes."

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

During the past month this Society has fallen back upon the older Oratorios, which it is pleasant to find maintain their hold on the public in spite of changes of taste or fashion. Haydn's "Creation" was given, on the 9th ult., and drew a very large audience. It is the custom in some quarters to sneer at the old master's work, but inadequate as it may be in some respects as illustrating its tremendous subject, yet as pure music it is a masterpiece of beauty, and so long as melody has the power to charm, so long will it survive in the affection of all true lovers of music. By the side of modern works the "Creation" is, of course, mere child's play to skilled executants, and it is almost needless to state that the choral and instrumental portions were rendered with the utmost smoothness under Mr. Barnby's direction. Miss Robertson (Mrs. Stanley Stubbs) displayed her flexible voice to advantage in the soprano airs, Mr. Lloyd sang "In native worth" and the rest of the tenor music to absolute perfection, and Mr. Watkin Mills merits equal praise for his splendid delivery of the bass solos and recitatives. This young artist is now fairly established in the foremost rank of our younger bass vocalists.

"The Messiah" was given as usual on Ash Wednesday. How Mr. Barnby's condensed version of Handel's work was rendered by the choir there is no need to say, but some of the soloists were new to their tasks in the Albert Hall. Mrs. Henschel and Miss Emily Winant both sang with great purity of style, though with scarcely sufficient power for so large a building. Mr. H. Piercy, however, made a very favourable impression, owing to his good delivery and excellent enunciation, and Mr. Watkin Mills excited quite a furore by his extremely fine rendering of "Why do the nations."

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

Those who listened to Spohr's "Calvary," at the fourth of this series of Concerts, on the 1st ult., must have been convinced that music of such exceptional merit could not have remained unheard since 1852, save from some cause quite apart from its value in the world of art. Unfortunately the Oratorio was produced at a time when the prejudices of the people—fostered by the clergy—against the presentation of so deeply religious a musical work were too strong to be ignored. Under the name of "Calvary"—the original German title being "Des Heilands letzte Stunden" ("The last hours of the Saviour")—the work was given at the Norwich Festival of 1839, conducted by the composer, having been previously heard in London, at the Hanover Square Rooms, under the direction of Professor Taylor, who translated the libretto. The denunciation of the subject of the Oratorio from the pulpit, before its production, at Norwich, could not of course prevent the audience from thoroughly appreciating the excessive beauty of the music; but, although concessions were made in accordance with the general desire that the Saviour should not be a personage in the work—the Apostle John being made to describe that which in the original is enacted by the principal character—save another performance at the Norwich Festival of 1845, and one at the Sacred Harmonic Society at Exeter Hall in 1852, the work was nearly ignored until the occasion under notice, when, thanks to the more liberal ideas now prevailing, it was presented for the first time in England as the composer wrote it. In the setting of the text Spohr has evidently deeply felt its solemn import, and in no part therefore has yielded to the temptation of sacrificing the sympathetic colouring of the words for the sake of sensational effect. The purity and beauty of the melodies, and the rich harmonies with which they are clothed, render the solos more powerfully eloquent than those in any other of Spohr's sacred works; and the whole of the choral portions, although, perhaps, not remarkable for vigour, at once arrest the attention by the consummate skill with which they are written for the voices, and the charm of the orchestral colouring. Amongst the solos which deservedly excited the greatest enthusiasm we may mention "Though all thy friends prove faithless" (with chorus), and "When this scene of trouble closes," both for Mary, exquisitely sung by Mrs. Henschel; the bass air for Judas Iscariot, "Woe, horror, grief," given with true intensity of feeling by Mr. Henschel, and Peter's pathetic air, "Tears of sorrow," admirably sung by Mr. Santley. The lovely trio, "Jesus, Heavenly Master," is too well-known to need more than a record of its fervent rendering by Mrs. Henschel, Miss Meason, and Madame Marian McKenzie, the evident desire for its repetition being very properly not responded to by the Conductor. The choruses were sung not only with an accuracy and precision which reflected the highest credit both upon the training of the Conductor and the ready response of the choir, but with a dramatic feeling which deeply impressed the audience, "Shame! shame!" and "What threatening tempest," being especially remarkable for a decision and boldness which contrasted well with the tender, consolatory style of the final chorus of Disciples, "Beloved Lord, Thine eyes we close." Mr. Barton McGuckin, who sang the parts of the Saviour, St. John, and Joseph of Arimathæa, could hardly be expected to do equal justice to the whole of his trying recitatives; but he sang well, and that he had earnestly studied the music was evidenced throughout the evening. The other soloists were excellent, and a good word must be given for the aid rendered in subordinate parts by Mr. W. L. Whitney and Master Lambert. The orchestra was in every respect most efficient. Although the tempi of some of the numbers seemed to us somewhat slow, Dr. Mackenzie assures us that, as a rule, he increased the speed of the metronome marks given by the composer. It is, perhaps, hardly fair to judge by the fact of an entire part of the Oratorio having occupied a longer time than it did under the composer's own direction, because there were pauses between the pieces for the applause—which, of course, was not permitted at Norwich. Be this as it may, the skill and judgment of Dr. Mackenzie in conducting the admirable forces under his command were amply evidenced throughout the evening; and we have every hope that "Calvary" may henceforth occupy the position to which it is justly entitled.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

After an interval of seven weeks, the Saturday Concerts were resumed on the 12th ult., on which afternoon two of the Leeds Festival novelties—Dr. Mackenzie's "Story of Sayid" and Dr. Stanford's "Revenge"—were presented, for the first time, to a Sydenham audience, under the conductorship of their respective composers. In stating our unhesitating conviction—contrary to the verdict of a certain section of the press—that the honours of the performance rested with the chorus and orchestra, we mean to put no slight upon the exertions of the two principal soloists, who strove most loyally to give full effect to the music allotted to them. Miss Annie Marriott was obviously a trifle overweighted in the more exacting passages of her part, but sang most conscientiously throughout; while Mr. Barton McGuckin, though evidently not in his best voice, produced the usual effect by his Scena "Where sets the sun." On the other hand, the performance of Mr. Watkin Mills, in which finish of style was at times quite sacrificed to abrupt vigour, proved a distinct falling off from his previous efforts. We have already spoken of the excellent performance of the orchestra, whose rendering of the "Solemn March" produced a great impression; and we will only add to our commendation of the efforts of the Oratorio Chorus that their share in the representation of Dr. Mackenzie's work was not merely marked by a greater degree of confidence, expression, and precision than any of their previous achievements, but that it triumphantly stood the test of a comparison, in regard to these essential qualities, with that taken by the redoubtable Leeds chorus itself. Dr. Stanford's fine setting of the ballad of "The Revenge," a work popular in the best sense of the word, followed; and here the increased familiarity with the music on the part of all concerned in its interpretation was attended by the happiest results. If the chorus erred at all, it was on the side of an excess of zeal; and Talleyrand's maxim, however sound in diplomacy, will not hold good for an instant in the domain of music.

With all due respect and admiration for "Parsifal," we cannot regard Herr Steinbach's concert adaptation of "Klingsor's Magic Garden" and "The Flower Maidens," from that opera—the chief orchestral novelty of the Concert of the 19th ult.—as an effective or impressive piece when thus detached from its scenic and vocal accessories. Another "first performance"—as far as the Crystal Palace was concerned—was that of the clever Concert Overture written by Mr. F. K. Hattersley for the recent Leeds Festival, and which met with a decidedly cordial reception, due to its intrinsic merit as well as to the fine rendering it received under Mr. Manns's bâton. In Madame Falk-Mehlig we were glad to hear once more, with her executive talent unabated and her powers of expression still further developed and matured, the gifted pianist so well known to our concert-halls some ten years ago under her maiden name of Anna Mehlig. Besides giving a very refined and graceful rendering of the solo part in Chopin's first Pianoforte Concerto, Madame Falk-Mehlig showed abundant brilliancy and force in Liszt's piquant version for pianoforte and orchestra of Weber's familiar Grand Polonaise (Op. 72), for which she won a double recall. Habitués of the Crystal Palace Concerts will bear us out when we express the opinion that Mr. Manns has led a finer performance of the Symphony—Beethoven's No. 8, in F—than that given on this occasion. Perhaps the gloomy rumours as to the future of the Crystal Palace had affected the efficiency of the players. Certain it is that the rendering was at times almost slipshod. Mr. Sims Reeves was the vocalist, and was much applauded for his efforts in Blumenthal's "Requital" and a recitative and air from "Gideon" (C. E. Horsley).

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Interest of a special nature attached to the Concert of Saturday, January 29, the programme containing a Pianoforte Trio in C minor, by Mr. Arthur Foote, the American composer, whose Suite for strings, produced at one of Mr. Henschel's Concerts, was noticed in our last number. In the present work the young Boston musician shows himself a student of Brahms in the frequent employment of syncopation in his themes and accompaniments; but there is no obscurity or affectation of mystery, the course of the music being perfectly easy to follow even at a first hearing. This was something to be thankful for, and if Mr. Foote's Trio did not create a profound impression, it did not, at any rate, prove tedious to the audience. The two middle movements are the best, which in an Op. 5 is not surprising. Whether the composer possesses any real individuality remains to be seen. At present he has shown himself to be an accomplished musician, but nothing more. This was Madame Néruda's last appearance previous to her continental tour. She took part in Mozart's favourite Quartet in D minor (No. 2), and with Mr. Hallé, in Schubert's spirited and effective Fantasia in C (Op. 159), for piano and violin. The pianist gave Beethoven's Sonata in E minor (Op. 90), the last movement of which he took at a singularly slow pace. We greatly prefer Mr. Hallé's former reading of this beautiful Allegretto. Mr. Lloyd sang "In native worth," and also an extremely tasteful and pleasing setting of Shakespeare's sixty-first Sonnet, by Dr. A. C. Mackenzie.

It is not too much to say that the audience on the following Monday was mainly attracted by the announcement that Mr. Schönberger would play Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata. The young German pianist had created an extremely favourable impression at his Recital, but, somewhat strangely, his programme on that occasion did not contain any example of the mighty Bonn master's works. High expectations were raised and the result was a surprising disappointment. In the slow movement, Mr. Schönberger displayed his exquisite delicacy of touch, but elsewhere he seemed strangely flurried, and not only played many false notes, but indulged in exaggerations of style peculiarly objectionable in Beethoven's music. The general feeling was that this could not be his true form, and the impression was strengthened by the admirable way in which he rendered the pianoforte part of Schumann's Trio in D minor. Nothing better than this could have been desired, and we therefore prefer to believe that the defects in the Sonata were due to some temporary indisposition. At this Concert Mr. Heermann made his first appearance as leader, and showed himself a sound classical executant in Beethoven's Quartet in A, No. 5, and in an Adagio of Spohr. Miss Liza Lehmann sang a little air from Flotow's "Martha," usually omitted in performance, and two of Brahms's Lieder, with the utmost refinement and charm.

A work by Beethoven marked "first time" is a rarity at these Concerts, but a reference to the catalogue shows that the Sonata in F, for pianoforte and horn (Op. 17), had really never been given before Saturday, the 5th ult. And yet it is a very pleasing example of the composer's first style, full of tune, and free from a touch of sadness save in the second subject of the first movement, which, by the way, reveals the true Beethoven. The piano part was of course child's play to Mr. Hallé, but that for horn enabled Mr. Paersch to display his wonderful command over his difficult instrument. Another interesting item was Hummel's Septet. This once popular work had been neglected for nearly a dozen years, and must have been a novelty to a large proportion of the audience. Hummel may have lacked the true fire of genius, but his Septet is an extraordinarily effective work, and those who heard it for the first time must have wondered why it should have been shelved for so long. The performance by Messrs. Hallé, Svendsen, Horton, Paersch, Hollander, Bottesini, and Piatti was absolutely perfect. Mr. Santley, who was in fine voice, sang Schubert's "Orpheus" and Handel's "Nasce al bosco."

Very few remarks are needed concerning the Concert of Monday, the 7th ult. Two works of Beethoven were performed, namely, the Quartet in F minor (Op. 95) and the Pianoforte Trio in D (Op. 70, No. 1). Mr. Schönberger was again the pianist, but he contented himself with Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor (Op. 35, No. 1), which he played with much vigour. The audience seemed pleased, and asked for a second solo, the pianist obliging them with the Capriccio in E minor (Op. 16, No. 2). By desire, Mr. Herbert Thorndike repeated Schubert's splendid song "Waldesnacht," which he sang with much artistic effect. Further excursions into the almost boundless domain of Schubert's Lieder would be profitable and pleasant.

Mr. Schönberger, who had so far scarcely proved himself an artist of the first rank, fairly astonished the audience of the following Saturday by his interpretation of Schubert's so-called "Wanderer" Fantasia in C (Op. 15). This magnificent work, thoroughly representative of its composer's genius at its brightest, is not often heard, owing to some caprice on the part of pianists, as it is one of the most effective pieces ever written for their instrument. After the first few bars, it became apparent that Mr. Schönberger was going to give an exceptional performance, and expectations were not disappointed. For our own part, however, we preferred the exquisite beauty of touch he evinced in the second movement to the fury and passion with which he attacked the Finale. No doubt the latter was a wonderful display of its kind, but, like Rubinstein, whom he has apparently taken as his model, Mr. Schönberger indulged in a good many wrong notes, which at no time are pleasing to the ear. He is still young, and if he is wise he will ultimately adopt a purer style and realise that there is no particular merit in mere noise. Even a popular audience, however, cannot resist anything in the way of a genuine sensation, and the performer was recalled three times. Mozart's Quartet in C (No. 6), and Rheinberger's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 38), were the concerted works at this Concert, and Signor Piatti played two movements of Molique's Violoncello Concerto in D. Miss Liza Lehmann again delighted her hearers by her rendering of Mozart's song "To Chloe," the opening of which bears a curious resemblance to that of Schubert's familiar Lied "Wohin!"

In the Concert of November 15 last, three movements of a Pianoforte Suite by Grieg, entitled "Aus Holberg's Zeiten," were introduced by Madame Frickenhaus, and in our notice of the Concert we said that the entire work should be given on a subsequent occasion. This suggestion was carried out on the 14th ult., Mr. Max Pauer being the executant. The work made a lively impression, thanks to the skilful manner in which the composer has imitated the early eighteenth century style, introducing, however, various little figures and progressions indicating a Scandinavian origin; and also to the admirable playing of Mr. Pauer, who is rapidly advancing in his art, and bids fair to take high rank therein. It was only fair that the Monday subscribers should have an opportunity of renewing acquaintance with Hummel's Septet, so the work was repeated with the same list of performers as before. Haydn's Quartet in D (Op. 64, No. 1), and a pleasing Romance Pathétique, by Signor Bottesini, played of course by the composer, were included in the programme. Miss Carlotta Elliot was a highly acceptable vocalist.

Mozart's Clarinet Quintet is one of those works which age cannot wither nor custom render stale. To say the least, it is as much enjoyed now as at any period since 1789, when it was composed, and, as the performance on Saturday, the 19th ult., with Mr. Straus as leader and Mr. Lazarus in the solo part, was absolutely perfect, the audience had a rare treat. In effective contrast with Mozart's mellifluous strains was Schumann's Piano Sonata in G minor (Op. 22), which was rendered in a highly able manner by Miss Fanny Davies. Of Beethoven's Trio in G (Op. 1, No. 2), and Molique's Saltarella for violin it is unnecessary to say anything. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel sang in their best manner Boieldieu's Duet from "Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village."

We must finish our record this month by chronicling the return of Dr. Joachim on the following Monday. How the prince of violinists was welcomed, and how he justified his welcome by his magnificent playing, goes without saying. The choice of Dvorák's masterly Sextet in A (Op. 48) to open the Concert was peculiarly appropriate, as it was to the initiative of Dr. Joachim that the work was first introduced, attention thereby being drawn to the genius of the Bohemian composer. A work of Beethoven is, however, a sine qua non on these occasions, and choice fell on the bright and tuneful Quartet in G (Op. 18, No. 2). Schumann's Fantasia in A minor, for violin (Op. 131), is one of the unfortunate composer's latest works, and it reflects the mental dimness which was fast coming upon him. Still, Mr. Joachim naturally looks upon it with regard, as it was specially composed for him. As an encore he gave a movement from one of Bach's Sonatas. Miss Zimmermann was heard to such advantage in Schubert's Impromptu in C minor (Op. 90), and some of the Valses Nobles (Op. 77), that the audience would have been pleased had she played the entire set.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Too much praise cannot be bestowed on Mr. Henschel for the enterprise and perseverance he is evincing in his arduous undertaking, but he has not, as yet, found his due reward in the patronage of the public. Not more than twice has St. James's Hall been full, and the attendance on some occasions has been wretchedly meagre. In other words, Mr. Henschel is experiencing the same fate that has befallen others who have believed, to their cost, in the existence of a widespread desire on the part of the public for orchestral Concerts. Thousands will flock to hear a sensational performer, or a work about which everybody is talking; but good sound, honest, artistic labour is regarded with as much indifference as ever. It is melancholy to be obliged to write thus, but it is of no use to blink the facts. In the general cultivation of music we are immeasurably in advance of our fathers, but some of the higher forms of the art are still only cared for by a select few. At the ninth Symphony Concert, on Friday, January 28, the Conductor ventured out of the ordinary track, with the usual result of empty benches. A selection of five numbers from Mozart's opera buffa "Cosi fan tutte" was given, the vocalists being Miss Larkcom, Madame De Fonblanque, Mr. Charles Kaiser, Mr. Thorndike, and Mr. Franklin Clive. The order in the score was not observed, but the lucid remarks on each number, including extracts from Otto Jahn's description of the opera, enabled the audience to realise the various situations, and so heightened their enjoyment of Mozart's delightful music. The same master's Symphony in E flat—perhaps the most truly melodious of all Symphonies—was also performed, and formed a welcome contrast to Brahms's clever but decidedly dry Pianoforte Concerto in D minor (Op. 15). Grand and even sublime as are some of the utterances of the composer whom Schumann "discovered," he is terribly unsympathetic when, metaphorically, he puts on the cap of the pedagogue and writes by the light of the midnight lamp, as he appears to have done in this instance. Mr. Max Pauer mastered the difficulties of the Concerto with apparent ease, and was duly applauded, but we refuse to believe that it will ever become a popular work.

The attendance was somewhat better at the next Concert, on Thursday, the 3rd ult., the principal attraction being undoubtedly Beethoven's Symphony in A, No. 7. Nor did those who came go away unrewarded, as a very fine and spirited rendering was given of the favourite work. The Allegretto was enjoyed so much that the audience asked for it a second time, though Mr. Henschel wisely declined the request; and at the close he received what is generally known as "an ovation." Miss Amina Goodwin also elicited much applause for her able rendering of a Minuet and Gavotte from Raff's Suite for pianoforte and orchestra (Op. 200); but we can only moderately commend Miss Hamlin's performance of Mendelssohn's Scena "Infelice." Schumann's fine Overture to "Genoveva" commenced the Concert, and Dvorák's highly characteristic Slavic Dance in C (Op. 46, No. 1), brought it to an effective close.

Mr. Henschel certainly made no concession to popular taste in drawing up the programme of the eleventh Concert, on Wednesday, the 9th ult., as it consisted almost entirely of works which appeal mainly, at present, to the artistic minority. One such is Brahms's first, and, as some consider, his finest Symphony in C minor. It is a truly great work, and the impression it made when first performed in this country at Cambridge, under Dr. Joachim, must be fresh in the recollection of all who were present on that occasion. The rendering by Mr. Henschel's orchestra was admirable, and the enthusiastic applause implied that the audience had fully appreciated the work. The greatest sensation of the evening, however, was produced by the wonderful capacity as a violinist shown by Miss Nettie Carpenter, in Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor. Tone, phrasing, and execution were alike remarkably good for so young a performer, and the future of Miss Carpenter will be watched with interest. Dr. Stanford's clever and humorous Overture to "The Canterbury Pilgrims" recalled pleasant recollections, and also regret that the necessity of chiefly considering provincial tastes compelled Mr. Carl Rosa to remove the Opera from his repertory after its first season. Beethoven's early and Mozart-like terzetto "Tremate, empi tremate," was well sung by Mrs. Henschel, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Eliot Hubbard.

We have often had to speak adversely of the Richter Concerts on account of their sectional character, but after his experience on Tuesday, the 15th ult., Mr. Henschel might declare that he has found the public sectional in its tastes. After trying Mozart, Mendelssohn, Brahms, and other masters in vain, he offered a programme of the Richter pattern, that is to say, Wagnerian selections, and a Beethoven Symphony thrown in, and succeeded in filling St. James's Hall with an enthusiastic audience. We do not profess to understand why this should be so; indeed, the narrowness of the public vision which such a state of things discloses is truly lamentable. At the same time it would be unduly severe to blame Concert-givers for occasionally offering a bait in order to secure a full house. With one exception the Wagner pieces were such as have been heard ad nauseam in St. James's Hall, namely, the Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde," Pogner's address from "Die Meistersinger," Wotan's Abschied with the Feuerzauber, from "Die Walküre," and the noisy "Huldigungs" Marsch. The vocal excerpts were sung, not declaimed, by Mr. Santley, who was in excellent voice, but the orchestra was not sufficiently subdued for the full attainment of Wagner's intentions. There was one trifling novelty, a sketch entitled "Träume," for strings (without basses), clarinets, bassoons, and horns. It is a kind of reflection upon the love duet in "Tristan und Isolde," and was set as a song by the composer, and also as a violin solo. Both the latter versions have been published for some years, but the orchestral piece was given for the first time on this occasion. It was evidently much liked, but the Conductor declined to grant an encore. The Symphony was the "Eroica," which was finely interpreted and enthusiastically received.

Herr Joachim appeared at the thirteenth Concert, on the 24th ult., the magic of his name being, of course, sufficient to draw a capital house. London amateurs would indeed have disgraced themselves had they hung back on such an occasion. The principal solo of the famous Hungarian violinist was Brahms's Concerto in D (Op. 77), which was first performed by him at the Gewandhaus Concerts on New Year's Day, 1879. It has frequently been heard in this country, but we cannot regard it as one of its composer's most inspired utterances. The solo part is laboured and ungrateful to the player, owing probably to the fact that Brahms is not himself a violinist. Still, with Herr Joachim as the executant, it is by no means ineffective, the vigorous Finale especially proving satisfactory to the audience on the present occasion. After Beethoven's Romance in F (Op. 50) there was a persistent demand for an encore, but Mr. Henschel as persistently declined, to his great honour be it said. It was a great treat to hear one of Haydn's Symphonies once more. These charming works are, by some foolish caprice, now studiously neglected by concert-givers, but after the enthusiasm awakened to-night by the No. 9, in B flat, of the Salomon set, Mr. Henschel will be unwise if he does not frequently allow the name of the delightful old master to appear in his programmes. Sterndale Bennett's Overture to "Parisina" opened this Concert and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in D (No. 2) concluded it. The performances throughout the evening were of unusual excellence.

MR. WALTER BACHE'S PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

A somewhat larger audience than usual assembled in St. James's Hall, on Monday afternoon, the 21st ult., when Mr. Bache gave his annual Recital. Whether this was because the programme was announced as miscellaneous, or because people are at last being converted to the truth as it is in Liszt, cannot be determined. At any rate, Mr. Bache continues to pursue his self-imposed mission with undiminished firmness, for besides the music of his revered master the scheme of the Recital only included a Prelude and Fugue of Bach, and Beethoven's Fifteen Variations in E flat to play the audience in, and Mendelssohn's Fantasia in F sharp minor (Op. 5) to play them out. The most conspicuous of Liszt's works was a so-called Fantasia quasi Sonate, "Après une Lecture de Dante." This is a most extraordinary composition, of which it is absolutely impossible to form any idea at a first hearing. Three themes were quoted in the programme, of which the first evidently represented the "Inferno," and the last the "Paradiso," but beyond this we could not trace any definite meaning in the constant progression of discords of which the piece is made up. A selection of four of the "Etudes d'execution transcendante" proved far more intelligible, and a transcription for two pianos of the picturesque symphonic poem "Mazeppa" came out very well. In this Mr. Bache was assisted by Mr. Fritz Hartvigson. If the audience did not appreciate the music, they did the admirable playing of Mr. Bache, recalling him several times in the course of the afternoon.

MR. SCHÖNBERGER'S PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

When this young pianist made his début before a London audience he was immediately hailed as a performer of no ordinary calibre, and as a natural consequence there was a large audience of connoisseurs at his second Recital on Wednesday, the 16th ult., at St. James's Hall. Sooth to say, however, as we have noted elsewhere, the strikingly favourable impression he made at the outset has scarcely been confirmed since. On the occasion now under notice his executive merits were fully displayed, but the defects of his style were unfortunately brought into greater prominence. These defects are precisely the same as those which prevent true critics from regarding Rubinstein as a perfect artist. The Ercles vein is suited neither to the one nor the other. Take, for example, Mr. Schönberger's rendering of Schubert's Sonata in A minor (Op. 42). Nothing more exquisitely refined and musical could be imagined than his delivery of the beautiful variations in the second movement, and nothing more at variance with the true canons of art than the pell-mell speed and fury with which he attacked the Finale. Mendelssohn's "Variations Sérieuses" suffered still more, the playing at times degenerating into a mere whirlwind of discord, in which it was difficult to distinguish wrong notes from right. Afterwards the performer calmed down and displayed the charm of his touch in some of Chopin's pieces and Raff's "Fileuse." Mr. Schönberger has exceptional gifts and he has youth on his side; it will be entirely his own fault if he does not develop into a great artist.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

A performance of Spohr's "Calvary," in some respects extremely remarkable, was given by this Society at the Shoreditch Town Hall, on the 21st ult. We need not here repeat what we have said elsewhere concerning the merits of this long neglected masterpiece; but it is only due to the energetic Hackney amateurs to say that they were the first to announce its revival. So far as regards the choir and orchestra, the rendering under Mr. Prout deserves to be praised in the highest terms. The choruses had been thoroughly mastered, and were sung not only with spirit and perfect precision, but with a large measure of refinement, the nuances being well observed. Spohr's tempi were kept throughout, greatly to the advantage of the music. The Society was not quite so fortunate with its soloists. Madame de Fonblanque was obviously out of voice, and being unable to attend the rehearsal, very properly resigned her principal air, "When this scene of trouble closes," to Miss Fusselle, who rendered it in a very praiseworthy manner. The tenor music was extremely well sung by Mr. Piercy, and Mr. E. Birch was also commendable; but Mr. Franklin Clive was not quite note-perfect, and was responsible for the only slip in the performance. We have not yet, however, mentioned that which rendered the occasion specially noteworthy. After the overture, Mr. Prout addressed the audience to the effect that, having regard to the solemn nature of the subject, applause would be unseemly, except at the end of each part. The result of this was twofold; the music was heard without interruption, and when a pause was made near the close, as is customary with this Society, to allow of early departures, profound silence was maintained, and no one stirred. Mr. Prout's innovation might well be copied on similar occasions. Great interest was taken in the revival, the hall being crowded, and money refused for all parts.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

A Concert was held on the 10th ult., at which Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture, Weber's Concertstück, Max Bruch's Violin Concerto (No. 1), and Mozart's Symphony in D (Hafner, 1782) afforded ample opportunities to the orchestra and soloists for proving their quality. Special indulgence was claimed for Mr. Sutcliffe, who, at very short notice, had undertaken to replace Mr. Inwards in the Violin Concerto, and acquitted himself excellently under the circumstances. Mr. Sutcliffe was also heard in Joachim's arrangement for orchestra and violin solo of Schumann's much-arranged Abendlied, which he gave with due delicacy of expression. Mr. Cook, who had charge of the solo instrument in the Concertstück, has a very clean, crisp touch, and a bright and alert style, and if his rendering failed to convey to the full the romantic and chivalrous sentiment which pervades this work, it was, at any rate, an agreeable and promising effort. The orchestra played very efficiently throughout, and although at times uncertain in the wind department, it should be noticed that the "extras" were fewer than we remember to have observed before. Besides the pieces already mentioned, three vocal numbers were included in the programme—"O tu Palermo"

(Verdi, "Vêpres Siciliennes"), sung with real dramatic instinct and intelligence by Mr. Price; Handel's "But who may abide," spiritedly given by Mr. Ridding; and Cherubini's "Ave Maria," in which the clarinet obbligato (Mr. Godfrey) deserves a word of commendation. In Professor Henry Holmes the orchestra had a sympathetic and conscientious Conductor. On the following Thursday Hummel's Septet received an excellent interpretation at the hands of Miss Grimson (piano), Mr. Carrodus (flute), Mr. Horton (oboe), Mr. Smith (horn), Mr. Kreuz (viola), Mr. Werge (violoncello), and Mr. A. Blagrove (double-bass), names which are interesting in more than one case as affording welcome proof of the transmission of musical talent. The chief credit of the performance undoubtedly rested with Miss Grimson, whose admirable phrasing and neatness of execution cannot be too highly praised. In Mr. Smith the College possesses a horn-player who is already competent, and is likely to become first-rate. Of the other players it will suffice to say that they were thoroughly at home in their parts. Miss Stone, who gave the Andante and Allegro (a most inappropriately named movement) from a Violin Suite in F, by F. Ries, showed a decided advance in breadth of tone and style since her last appearance at these Concerts. Improvement was also evidenced by Miss Berry, who sang "Ah se tu dormi" ("Giulietta e Romeo," Vaccaj) in very creditable style. Of the remaining numbers of the programme, a Fantasia and Fugue from Rheinberger's Sonata (No. 9), for organ, and Chopin's familiar Polonaise in A flat deserve notice. Of the former, Mr. Noble gave an intelligent though somewhat reserved rendering; while Miss M. Moore, if a little overweighted in the latter piece, played with the finished and unaffected style which Mr. Franklin Taylor invariably imparts to his pupils.

ST. MARYLEBONE PARISH CHURCH.

This spacious edifice was crowded to excess on the day after Ash-Wednesday (the 24th ult.), when Dr. Stainer's new work, "The Crucifixion," was performed for the first time. There was no cause for wonder at this. The performances of the same composer's "Daughter of Jairus" a short time ago had, no doubt, predisposed the local public in his favour, and, further, special musical services during Lent are happily becoming common. We have spoken at length of this beautiful setting of the "Passion" in our review columns, and therefore need only dwell here on the noteworthy features of the performance so far as may be done with propriety. There was a large and thoroughly efficient choir, all the choral portions of the work being rendered very nearly to perfection. Particular mention should be made of the vigour shown in the stirring chorus "Fling wide the gates" in the March to Calvary, and the refinement and true intonation in the unaccompanied number "God so loved the world." The names of the soloists were not given, but we may say without offence that they were well up to their duties, the tenor especially singing his effective part with taste and expression. The accompaniments were beautifully played, and the composer, who conducted, must have been well satisfied with the rendering of his work. Considering that the hymns were, of course, unfamiliar to the congregation, they were fairly taken up.

THE NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD.

Our readers are aware that this year the National Eisteddfod of Wales holds its meetings at Caerludd—otherwise London—and that the Albert Hall will be occupied for that purpose during four days in August next. The full programme is now before us, with particulars of numerous competitions in poetry, prose, translation, music, painting, sculpture, and design. We are here concerned with those in the department of music only, and to them shall confine our attention. For composition, nine prizes are offered, amounting in value to £101. They include £25 for the best sacred Cantata (soli, chorus, and orchestra); £10 for the best Congregational Anthem; £7 for the best Vocal Trio, Pianoforte Trio, and Part-song respectively; and £5 each for the best soprano, contralto, tenor, and baritone Solos. There is also a special prize of £25 for the best orchestral Overture, the donor of which has chosen his own adjudicators—Messrs. Stainer, Prout, and John Thomas. All these are restricted to Welsh competitors—that is to say, natives of Wales or Monmouthshire, persons of Welsh parentage, or who have lived in Wales during twelve months prior to the first day of the Eisteddfod. In the department of vocal and instrumental performance there are no fewer than twenty-one prizes, aggregate value £560, besides several gold medals. The first and second choirs (200 to 250 voices), in an open choral competition, will receive £200 and £50 respectively. In another competition of the same class (120 to 150 voices), limited to Welsh singers, the prizes are £100 and £25. A third, for male voices (50 to 70) and open to all, offers one prize of £50; another of £20 being connected with a sight-singing test. There is one prize (£10) for the best Vocal Quartet, and there are two of £5 for the best Vocal Duet—soprano and contralto, tenor and bass. The vocal solo prizes are nine in number, each value £5. In addition there is an orchestral band competition (£30), another in String Quartet playing (£10), and three prizes of £5 for pianoforte, harp, and harmonium solos. In each case, save the exception already pointed out, the adjudicators will be chosen from the following list:—Sir G. A. Macfarren, Signor Randegger, Mr. Joseph Bennett, Mr. John Thomas (Pencerdd Gwalia), Mr. Joseph Parry, Mus. Doc., Mr. David Jenkins, Mus. Bac., Mr. Emlyn Evans, Mr. J. H. Roberts, Mus. Bac., and Mr. John Thomas (Llanwrtyd). In connection with the competitions open to all comers, the jury consists of three Welshmen and three Englishmen, counting Signor Randegger as an Englishman by adoption. It is to be hoped that English choirs will enter for, at any rate, the greatest prize and make a good fight.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

Instrumental chamber music, like Shakespeare, spells ruin for most of the caterers who have touched it in Birmingham of late years, and it seems pretty evident that the directors of the musical section of the Midland Institute can claim no immunity from the general fate. On one or two recent occasions the monthly Saturday Concerts have been well attended, but only when the instrumental features of the programme were supplemented by, or rather subordinated to, vocal attractions of a higher order than is customary at Chamber Concerts; when shorn of such exceptional baits for the groundlings, the Concerts have been given generally to a beggarly account of empty benches. That was the fate, at all events, of the monthly Concert on the 5th ult., when the instrumental performances of Mr. T. M. Abbott (violin), Mr. Edward Howell (violoncello), and Dr. R. M. Winn (pianoforte) were relieved only by the vocal essays of Mr. Edward Levetus. The chief features of the instrumental selection were Schumann's Pianoforte Trio in F (Op. 80), composed in 1847, Mendelssohn's B flat Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, and a Romance for violin, by Max Bruch. The Schumann trio was admirably played throughout, but in the Mendelssohn duet there was an occasional want of spirit and contrast. The singing of Mr. Levetus was marred by an excessive vibrato, but his selection was a judicious one, and he sang with feeling and a certain refinement, his best efforts being perhaps Rubinstein's "The Dream" and Raff's "Mädchenlied."

Messrs. Harrison's third Subscription Concert, on the 7th ult., was signalised by the re-appearance in Birmingham, after an interval of many years, of the veteran tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves, whose performances on this occasion were distinguished by a refinement and expressiveness that repeatedly kindled the enthusiasm of the audience. His contributions included Handel's "Deeper and deeper still," with its customary sequel, "Waft her, angels"; Dibdin's "Tom Bowling," and a part in the old duet "All's well" with Mr. Santley. Mr. Reeves encountered a right royal reception from an overflowing and demonstrative audience, but, as on former occasions, he steadfastly refused to accede to all demands for repetitions. Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli sang "Una voce poco fa" with rare charm and finish; Madame Patey especially delighted the audience in Spohr's fine song "Bright star of night" and Anderton's "Come to me, O ye children"; Mr. Orlando Harley's agreeable tenor voice was heard to advantage in "Love sounds the alarm"

(from "Acis and Galatea") and Balfe's "Good night, beloved"; Mr. Santley was in unusually good voice, and gave Purcell's "Let the dreadful engines" in grand style. In the instrumental department the honours were divided between Miss Nettie Carpenter (violin), Miss Fanny Davies (pianoforte), and Mr. Hollman (violoncello). The two ladies united with excellent effect in Grieg's Sonata in F, Miss Davies especially charmed the audience in Rubinstein's Valse Allemande, and Mr. Hollman, in two movements from Mendelssohn's duet Sonata in B flat and an "Air de ballet," pizzicato, by Léo Délibes, gave abundant proofs of his mastery of the instrument.

The undoubted success achieved by "Erminie," which first saw the footlights at Birmingham a couple of years ago, inspired high expectations of "Mynheer Jan," a new work by the same composer, which was produced at the Birmingham Grand Theatre, on the 7th ult. Herr Jakobowski, however, has not been so fortunate either in his libretto or in his musical inspiration as on the previous occasion, and though "Mynheer Jan" is considerably above the average of English comic operas, it has not taken the public by storm as "Erminie" did. The principal characters were sustained by Miss Camille d'Arville, Miss Violet Melnotte, Mr. Frank Wyatt, M. Marius, and Mr. Harry Paulton, all of whom spared no effort to make the production a success. It is scarcely necessary to add that the piece was sumptuously mounted, alike as regards scenery and costumes.

At Mr. Stockley's second Orchestral Concert, on the 10th, a work, new to Birmingham, was produced under the composer's direction in the shape of Dr. C. Villiers Stanford's "Elegiac" Symphony, suggested by Tennyson's "In Memoriam," and first heard at one of the Concerts of the Cambridge University Musical Society, on March 7, 1882. As the Symphony has since been given at the Gloucester Musical Festival, and various important Concerts in London and elsewhere, its construction and merits need not be discussed here, and it will suffice to remark that the Birmingham public were profoundly impressed by its solemn beauty and scholarly character, as was testified more particularly by their applause after the slow movement in F major, and the enthusiastic recall of the composer-conductor on the conclusion of the work. Among other interesting features of the Concert may be mentioned the Overtures to "Euryanthe" (Weber) and "Les deux Journées" (Cherubini), the Ballet music from Rubinstein's "Feramors," and Mendelssohn's Notturno from the "Midsummer Night's Dream." In one or two instances these performances would have benefited by an additional rehearsal, but the playing of the Symphony left little to be desired. Madame Clara Samuell and Mr. Robert Grice were the vocalists. The lady distinguished herself more particularly in Handel's "Lusinghe più care" and two chamber songs, Spohr's "Bird and Maiden" and Macfarren's "Pack clouds away," in which latter the clarinet part was capitally played by Mr. G. Pountney. Mr. Grice sang Handel's "Revenge, Timotheus cries," with considerable power and spirit, and was even more successful in "The sea rules all," from Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron." Mr. Stockley's conducting left nothing to be desired.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company commenced a three weeks' season at the Grand Theatre, on the 14th, but owing presumably to the numerous operatic series, comic and serious, good, bad, and indifferent, with which the local public had been plied during the previous two or three months, the measure of support accorded to the undertaking has thus far been inadequate. The most popular selections hitherto have been Bizet's "Carmen," Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon," Gounod's "Faust," Wagner's "Lohengrin," and F. Corder's new opera "Nordisa," which was given for the first time in Birmingham on the 22nd ult. Madame Marie Roze has won new laurels here as Marguerite and Elsa, which are likely to rank henceforth amongst her most attractive assumptions, and she has surprised her local admirers by the improvement in her voice, which seems to have recovered now much of the freshness and stability of former years. Madame Gaylord has been suffering from a slight cold and hoarseness, which have impaired her vocal effects; but her acting and phrasing remain as charming as ever. The light, brilliant, and flexible voice of Madame Georgina Burns continues to charm all hearers, and the new tenor, Mr. Edward Scovell, is making rapid way in popular favour in virtue of the warmth and spirit of his acting, as well as of the refinement of his singing.

The Midland Musical Society, which has succeeded the old Musical Association as the public musical caterer on Saturday nights at popular prices, continues to make steady progress, under the direction of Mr. H. M. Stevenson. On the 19th ult. a large audience assembled in the Town Hall to listen to a very creditable performance of F. H. Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty," by the members of this Society. The Saturday Organ Recitals of Mr. Astley Langston, relieved by occasional vocal solos, are also meeting with much favour here. Sunday musical entertainments are on the increase. A Concert of secular music, in which string and military bands took part, was given in the Great Hall at Aston Lower Grounds, on the 20th ult., when the principal vocalist was Miss Emily Parkinson. At Curzon Hall, Mr. Snazelle completed, on the same day, a Sunday series of sacred Recitals, in which he was assisted by other vocalists.

Of the Festival Choral Society's Concert, on the 24th ult., when Verdi's "Requiem" was performed for the first time in Birmingham, particulars must be reserved for next issue.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Hallé series of Concerts is coming to an end, not only as regards the present season, but unfortunately, according to the ill-fated announcements, with no prospect of their being resumed. This decision is regrettable, and whilst it was scarcely unexpected in view of the considerable falling off in the public patronage of these Concerts, it is difficult to understand why sufficient support has not been forthcoming to retain in Liverpool a further continuance of Mr. Hallé's organisation. It has, however, for some time been manifest in local musical circles, that on the principle of "a house divided against itself," either the Philharmonic Society or the Hallé Concerts must come to grief. Mr. Hallé has been, since his appointment to the Philharmonic Society three years ago, the Conductor of both organisations, and whilst the Society has possessed the advantage of a chorus and consequently the ability to give choral works, Mr. Hallé has, at his own Concerts, made up for the deficiency by a more numerous orchestra. The similarity between the two series of Concerts, which have for many years formed the staple of Liverpool's music, is sufficiently apparent to account for a loss of public interest in either the one or the other, and now the result is seen in the threatened termination of what had, through considerable uphill work and difficulty, established itself in popular favour as an organisation second to none in the kingdom. It is to be hoped, however, for the sake of Liverpool, that Mr. Hallé's decision is open to reconsideration.

At the sixth and seventh Concerts of the series, held on January 18 and the 1st ult. respectively, the chief orchestral features were a Scherzo Capriccioso in D flat, by Dvorák; an Andante in E flat, from an unpublished Symphony of Haydn's; Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique in C; a Rhapsodie Hongroise, by Liszt, No. 2, in D; and Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34. The two Rhapsodies—for Dvorák's Scherzo may correctly be classified under the term—were new to Liverpool, and although naturally distinctive in their construction and general style, each created considerable interest. The former is a model of scholarly genius, full of intricate difficulties and constant modulations; and the latter is a composition of perfect symmetry and taste, without that excess of percussion and glitter which occasionally betrays itself in these Rhapsodies of the lamented Abbé. The Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz is aptly so called, and its masterly construction and daring originality, apart from the weird effects produced, bear testimony to the budding genius of the then youthful musician. Mr. Hallé himself was the pianist at both of these Concerts, and his conspicuous ability, particularly in Mendelssohn's "Capriccio brillante" in B, was never shown to greater advantage. The purity of Mr. Hallé's style, and the clearness of his touch, added to his scholarly conception of the intentions of great works, constitute the best qualifications for the true execution of Concertos—perhaps the highest form of pianoforte music. Mr. Hallé's reception was, in this instance, of a particularly cordial nature, and he was compelled to satisfy the cravings of the audience by giving as an addendum Schubert's Moment Musicale in F minor. Miss Hope Glenn and Mdlle. Schneider were the vocalists at these two Concerts respectively.

The Philharmonic Society, in the regular sequence of the season's series, gave its seventh and eighth Concerts on January 25 and the 8th ult. The first was notable because of the re-appearance, after a somewhat lengthy interval, of Signor Piatti, who, in addition to some miscellaneous selections, played Molique's Violoncello Concerto with his usual perfect finish and ability. The Symphony was Gade in C minor, and, at the following Concert, Haydn's charming No. 7, in C. Beethoven's Choral Fantasia (Op. 80) also figured in this programme, but its rendition was scarcely as complete or satisfactory as might have been desired. Any deficiency in this instance, however, was amply atoned for on the part of the choir by the intelligence and care with which they sang, in the course of the evening, two part-songs by Sullivan and Pinsuti. Madame Marie Roze was the vocalist at this Concert, and won high favour by her rendering of three well known selections, "Divinités du Styx" from "Alceste," the "Habanera" from "Carmen," and Paladilhe's Serenade.

The opera season, extended as it was, has at length come to an end, and Mr. Rosa has left Liverpool to solicit the patronage of other sections of the provinces. His success here has been simply phenomenal, and whatever may be the experience of other musical ventures, it certainly appears to be an established fact that English opera, or at least the Carl Rosa organisation, has made for itself a certain and permanent home in Liverpool; and, as Mr. Rosa said, in a short speech from the stage on the last night of his many triumphs, we should be proud of the distinction of having given the lead in this respect.

We have already referred to the successful first production of Corder's "Nordisa." Notwithstanding its comparatively modest pretensions, its reception has been of the most hearty character, resulting in its constant repetition with unabated enthusiasm, and it now remains to be seen whether Liverpool's verdict will be permanently confirmed.

The last night of the season was devoted to a performance—the first in Liverpool for several years—of Flotow's "Martha." In this Mr. Seymour Jackson's singing, as Lionel, was marked throughout by great sweetness and taste. Madame Georgina Burns as Martha, Miss Marian Burton as Nancy, Mr. Leslie Crotty as Plunket, and Mr. Aynsley Cook as Lord Tristan, were equally successful, and combined in the presentation of a capital performance. Mr. Goossens directed the opera, and to him is due a considerable share of the success of the entire season.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

The programme of the Gentlemen's Concert of January 31 was especially interesting, and it is not surprising that it attracted an unusually large and enthusiastic audience. The chief item was Dr. C. H. H. Parry's Orchestral Suite in A minor, not only a very musicianly, but in many respects a charming work, skilfully constructed and scored. Mr. Santley, as if to make it pre-eminently an English night, gave Purcell's "Let the dreadful engines" and the "Vicar of Bray," in addition to the dramatic "Son of the Ocean Isle," by Betterton (if that be the name of the author).

On the following Thursday, Mr. Hallé gave "Judas Maccabæus," upon which there has been quite a run this season. Mdlle. Trebelli made her first essay here in Oratorio music, and gave promise of great future success. Her voice—although rapidly gaining fulness—is as yet scarcely what we look for in "Mighty kings"; but in the quieter portions of the work Mdlle. Trebelli was admirable, and in clearness and finish of execution irreproachable. Miss Hilda Wilson and Mr. Lloyd were excellent, and Mr. Bridson distinctly advanced his reputation here.

For the 10th ult., Mr. Hallé arranged a very alluring programme, including the Overture "Der Freischütz" (splendidly given), Schumann's Symphony in C minor, Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise" in D (No. 2), with Bach's Concerto in D minor and Mozart's in F, for three pianos. One of the largest audiences of the season was drawn by the unusual chance of hearing three such players as Miss Zimmermann, Miss Fanny Davies, and Mr. Hallé himself. Mozart's triple Concerto—said to be performed for the first time in this country—is a very agreeable, placid, and graceful work; and its execution was most finished and equal. The pianos accorded admirably in tone, and the players in neatness of execution and in style. That any great effect was created could not be averred, but everybody was pleased by the suavity of the music, and by the smoothness and delicacy of its presentation. Bach's work is of different calibre and more masculine vigour, displaying the unrivalled contrapuntal skill, as well as the ever fresh fancy of the great master. The vocalist of the evening, Miss Agnes Janson, made a very favourable impression in some Scandinavian and French songs. On the 17th ult., Mr. Hallé, for the first time since the severe illness which has so grievously interfered with his plans for the season, re-appeared as the solo pianist, playing with undiminished skill and ease Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata and Chopin's F minor Concerto. If Miss Emily Winant could sustain a steady pure tone, her powerful voice would be very acceptable; but an incessant vibrato is anything but agreeable. Moszkowski's Suite in F (Op. 39) was played for the first time, some portions being very pleasing. Concerning "Elijah" (given on the 24th ult.), I need not write.

Mr. de Jong concluded his series of Concerts on the 12th ult., with a party including Mdlle. Marimon (so long absent as to be quite unknown to many present Concert frequenters), Madame Sanderini, Miss Eleanor Rees, and Messrs. Guy and Maybrick, with Signor Mattei as pianist, and Signor Hegzesi as violoncellist. For his benefit Concert, on the 26th ult., Mr. de Jong announces a large party, and a mode of selecting a portion of his programme which has been tried at other Concert-rooms here, but not at the Free Trade Hall. I cannot think that the voting for the instrumental items is a very dignified mode of arranging the scheme, or calculated to raise the character of the speculation.

After the despatch of my last report, the Vocal Society, under Mr. H. Watson, gave a performance, with piano accompaniment, of Mendelssohn's "Athalie." The work was, of course, by the want of the orchestral accompaniments, shorn of much of its charm; but the body of tone produced in the choruses was mellow and pleasing, and the ensemble singing reflected much credit upon the Conductor.

On the 6th ult., Signor Risegari and his coadjutors gave their second Chamber Music Concert for the season. Clearly the change to Saturday evenings was a wise move; the audience was much larger than heretofore, and very enthusiastic. Mendelssohn's Quartet in E minor was deliciously played; and although Spohr's Duet in D major, for two violins, was a little short of perfection, Brahms's Sextet in B flat made full amends. The work is now so well known that no criticism is required of the performance, which was most creditable to all concerned.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

The fifth Bradford Subscription Concert, which was given on January 28, was almost wholly divided between ballads and solo instrumental performances. The programme was an interesting one, and was carried out by several capable artists, four of whom were vocalists and three instrumentalists. Madame Valleria was heard to excellent advantage in two songs by Mendelssohn—a "Winter song" and "The Violet"—and Schumann's impassioned "Widmung," which latter was warmly encored. Miss Ada Doyle (contralto) sang in place of Miss Alma de Lisle, and met with a fair reception, although she had a cold, and was unable to do full justice to her selections. Mr. Charles Ellison, who is about to join the Carl Rosa Company, displayed his vocal abilities with favourable effect, and Signor Foli "brought down the house" by his able rendering of Formes's song "In shelter and vale." The Concert opened with two movements from Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, which were played by Mr. Tivadar Nachèz, Mr. Hollman, and Signor Bisaccia, and the only other concerted performance of the evening was a vocal quartet, by Brinley Richards. Miss Fanny Davies was the solo pianist, and she gave a brilliant rendering of Liszt's "Guomenreigen," and a fine interpretation of Chopin's Prelude in D flat, in addition to which she also played Schubert's Impromptu (Op. 142), a Barcarole by Mendelssohn, and a Valse by Rubinstein. Mr. Tivadar Nachèz established very favourable relations with the audience by his performance of two of Bach's compositions, an adaptation from one of Schumann's works, and two of his own compositions. Mr. Hollman's refined performance proved an enjoyable feature. Signor Bisaccia was the accompanist.

The sixth Subscription Concert, given in St. George's Hall, on the 15th ult., differed from its predecessor as much as one Concert could possibly differ from another. Almost everything was new, and the novelty was of a strikingly interesting character. Dvorák and Berlioz—to whom the Committee have latterly paid much attention, and whose works have met with ever-ready appreciation from the subscribers—were drawn upon for the chief portions of the music, the former being represented by "The Spectre's Bride," and the latter by "The flight into Egypt," from "The Childhood of Christ." The work of the Bohemian composer completely fascinated the audience, its graphic force and dramatic intensity, its fine descriptive themes and subtle forms of orchestration, sustaining attention from beginning to end of the gruesome story. The declamatory music assigned to the baritone was delivered by Mr. Santley with all that artistic capability which distinguishes him, and with energy sufficient for the exacting demands of the part. Miss Marriott and Mr. Lloyd sang the soprano and tenor parts, and it need scarcely be said that the music assigned to these chief actors was rendered with all possible effect. The chorus and orchestra did their work with finish. The selection from Berlioz's work, unlike the majority of his music, requires no great effort from executants, and the performance was in every respect as efficient as the rendering of any composition so simple and melodious should be. Mr. Lloyd sang the tenor solo with marked success. The rest of the programme included Wagner's orchestral poem the "Siegfried Idyll," Méhul's Overture to "Joseph and his Brethren," Beethoven's "Hallelujah," and Mr. Goring Thomas's "Kennst du das Land?" which last-mentioned item was given by Miss Marriott. The Concert was an unqualified success.

Mr. W. B. Sewell gave a choral Concert on the 5th ult., with the assistance of the members of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, Mr. Sewell's orchestral band supplying the accompaniment. Novelty was provided in the shape of Dr. Stanford's "The Revenge," which was followed by Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." Dr. Stanford's work was given with great efficiency, and its striking themes and bold phrases told with much effect. Not only were the declamatory passages well sung, but the more subtle features of the music, such as the instrumentation descriptive of the heaving of the vessels, the chorus of the night, and many other picturesque incidents, were presented with no little skill. An equally enjoyable performance was given of Mendelssohn's Cantata, although it was evident that much more labour had been bestowed on the preparation of Dr. Stanford's work. The solo parts were in the hands of Miss Emilie Norton and Mr. J. Mellor, and Mrs. Muff joined Miss Norton in the duet. The band opened the Concert with a performance of Berlioz's "Hungarian March" and closed with the Overture to "William Tell." Mr. Sewell conducted.

The fifth of Mr. Ford's popular Concerts, given on the 16th ult., in the Leeds Coliseum, was a rare musical treat. The programme opened with Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, and closed with Schubert's famous Octet in F. The Octet occupied a little over an hour in performance, and an interval was wisely permitted in the middle of the work. Messrs. Holmes, Grimson, Gibson, Howell, Reynolds, Clinton, Wootton, and Paersch, the executants, gave a fine rendering of the work, and each in his turn made the most of the opportunities which are afforded for individual players as well as for the ensemble. The Quintet proved equally enjoyable, and the gracefulness of its forms, and the admirable management of the clarinet part, especially elicited admiration. The artists—Messrs. Holmes, Grimson, Gibson, Howell, and Clinton—acquitted themselves also in this instance with skill. The only instrumental solo was that of Mr. Holmes, who played a Ballad by his brother, Mr. Alfred Holmes—a charming little work free from showiness. The performance was so admirable that the audience insisted upon the re-appearance of Mr. Holmes. Miss Clara Perry was the vocalist, and her songs were "There's a bower of roses," from "The Veiled Prophet," and "Robert toi que j'aime." Miss Perry's efforts gained her an enthusiastic recall. The last Concert of the season is to be given this month, when Dr. Joachim, Signor Piatti, and Miss Fanny Davies will take part.

Dr. Stainer's Cantata "St. Mary Magdalen," and portions of Mr. Gadsby's Dramatic Cantata "The Lord of the Isles," were produced on the 14th ult., on the occasion of the first Concert of the Heaton and Frizinghall Choral Society, at the Bradford Church Institute. In spite of sundry misfortunes attending the Concert, a highly capable vocal effort was made by the Society. Mr. Gadsby's work was mercilessly cut up, owing to the lateness of the hour at which it was reached, but such numbers as were heard showed great power and strong originality. Miss Norton, Miss Richardson, Mr. Herbert Parratt, and Mr. Newton Laycock took part as soloists, the last-named gentleman officiating as substitute for Mr. Riley, who was indisposed. Mr. Stocks Hammond was the Conductor.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

The third of Mrs. Viner Pomeroy's Classical Chamber Concerts was given at the larger of the Victoria Rooms, on the 2nd ult., and was well attended. Certainly the present arrangements appeared to "hit" the popular taste more decisively than the old seemed to do, and perhaps success of this sort is essential to the carrying on of the Concerts; but we confess to finding the programmes less interesting than formerly, more especially the one now under consideration. It consisted of Mozart's Quartet in C (No. 6), for strings; Rubinstein's Trio in B flat (Op. 52), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello; Pianoforte Solos—(a) Etude, (b) Nocturne (Op. 55), (c) Valse (Op. 42), Chopin; and Haydn's Quartet in B flat (Op. 76), for strings. The executants were Mr. Henry Holmes (first violin), Mr. E. Woodward (second violin), Mr. Ellis Roberts (viola), and Mr. J. Pomeroy (violoncello), Mrs. Pomeroy presiding at the pianoforte. The Quartets went very fairly. Mrs. Pomeroy acquitted herself well in the Trio, and her solos evidenced careful study. The vocalists were Miss Selina Quick and Mr. Henry Piercy, who were both encored.

The band of the Grenadier Guards, under Mr. Dan Godfrey, gave two very successful Concerts in Colston Hall, Bristol, on the 7th ult. There was a fair attendance in the afternoon, but in the evening the hall was densely crowded, and hundreds were turned from the doors. A very varied and popular programme was given, and the members of the band did themselves and their Conductor infinite credit by their admirable performance. The vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd and Mr. Hirwen Jones, both of whom are known in Bristol, and who were loudly applauded for their respective songs, and for a vocal duet, in which they were heard to great advantage.

The Bristol Musical Association gave its forty-fifth Concert at Colston Hall, on the 12th ult., to a very large audience, there being hardly a vacant seat in any part of the building. The programme was miscellaneous, consisting of overtures, choruses, and vocal and organ solos. One of the features of the Concert was a grand Jubilee March, which was specially composed for this Concert by Mr. George Riseley, by whom it was finely played. The principal subject was good and particularly well treated, and as a whole the composition was meritorious, and evidently produced a most favourable effect, the applause being vociferous; but Mr. Riseley held to his rule, and refused the encore which was loudly demanded. The vocalists were Miss Marian Fenna, who has often visited Bristol, and Dr. Roxburgh, a well known amateur from Weston-super-Mare, who has never before sung for the Society.

On the 14th ult. Miss Farler gave her annual grand Ballad Concert, and, as usual, secured a most brilliant company of musicians, and we are glad to say that her energy was rewarded by a good attendance. The vocalists were Madame Valleria, Miss Ada Doyle, Miss Farler, Mr. Charles Ellison, and Signor Foli; pianoforte, Miss Fanny Davies; violin, Mr. Nachèz; violoncello, Mr. Hollman; Conductor, Signor Bisaccia. The playing of Miss Davies was that of a highly finished musician, and she has evidently caught the spirit of her teacher, Madame Schumann; she was also exceedingly happy in her selections, and deservedly gained a most hearty encore. We have heard Madame Valleria in better voice, but after each effort she was recalled; Miss Ada Doyle was well received, as was also Mr. Ellison, who sang with great taste, and Signor Foli was as popular as ever.

The third of Miss Lock's Chamber Concerts took place on the 16th ult., in the smaller of the Victoria Rooms, which seemed scarcely large enough for the audience, this being due partly no doubt to the announcement that Mr. Walter Macfarren was to contribute several pianoforte solos. The Concert opened with Beethoven's Trio in C minor, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, which was fairly rendered by Miss Mary Lock (who is a pupil of Mr. Macfarren), Messrs. Hudson and Pavey. Mr. Macfarren then gave Chopin's Nocturne in D flat, and afterwards the Valses in C sharp minor and D flat by the same composer, and later in the evening contributed the Rondino Espressivo and Impromptu Gavotte in A from his own pen, for which he gained hearty encomiums. Mendelssohn's Sonata in D, for piano and violoncello, opened the second part of the programme, and was well given by Miss Lock and Mr. Pavey. The vocalist was Miss Kate Nicholls, who contributed two songs in a very pleasing manner. Mr. Hudson also played a Romance for violin of his own composition, which evinced some musical talent, and Mr. F. Rootham did good service as accompanist.

As usual, the greatest interest was manifested in the annual "Ladies' Night" of the Bristol Orpheus Glee Society, and on the 17th ult. Colston Hall was thoroughly well filled with an expectant audience, whose hopes of an evening of rare music were not disappointed; for on this occasion the Orpheonists did more than sustain their well-known reputation, there really being hardly room for criticism throughout the performance of a long and varied programme. The Conductor, Mr. George Riseley, took his place at the desk at eight o'clock, amid loud applause, and the following pieces were performed:—Part 1, "The National Anthem," arranged in five parts by G. Riseley; "Strike the lyre," J. Cooke; "Hymn to Night," Beethoven; "Hushed in death," H. Hiles; "Image of the rose," Reichardt; "Jubilee Ode," G. Riseley; "Drink to me only with thine eyes," arranged by G. Riseley; "The martyrs of the arena," L. de Rille; "The dying child," Viotta; "Jubilee Choral Song," W. Macfarren. Part 2, "Highland war song," W. Macfarren; "Ossian," Beschnitt; "Love and wine," Mendelssohn; "Hours of beauty," Hargreaves; "The sad autumn winds," Root and Riseley; "The Retreat," L. de Rille; "Absence," Hatton; "The Chafers," Truhn. The arrangement of the "National Anthem" was effective, and Mr. Riseley was peculiarly happy in the harmonising of "Drink to me only with thine eyes," in which the alto solo was well sung by Mr. Jones, of Bristol Cathedral. For special commendation we should select the "Hymn to Night," the sustained delicacy of which was most remarkable; the vigorous and dramatic singing of "The martyrs of the arena," and the exquisite tenderness of Viotta's lovely composition. Mendelssohn's "Love and wine" was very finely given, and "The Retreat," which is an old favourite, was more successfnl than ever. The choir did not seem to flag in the least, but gave "The Chafers" even a little too "fast and furiously," if anything, though certainly it was a fault on the right side. Mr. Dyer sang the solo in "The sad autumn winds" with very good effect. It remains to say a word of the "Jubilee" compositions, which were specially written for this Concert. The harmony of Mr. Riseley's was musicianly and well considered, and exhibited sound knowledge and no mean skill. Several of the modulations were extremely pleasing, and though the first and second subjects were not particularly striking, the one in A flat, introduced in the latter part of the composition, was truly musical, and was very artistically presented. The "Ode" is certainly a very creditable production, and it received full justice at the hands of the Orpheonists. The numbers of the singers were slightly in excess of previous years, and the choir was particularly well balanced. The voices were distributed as follows—seventeen altos, twelve first tenors, twelve second tenors, eighteen first basses, and sixteen second basses. Mr. Riseley has every reason to be proud of the entire success of the Concert, which result could only have been obtained by the most earnest and anxious study on the part of both Conductor and choir. The wise rule of "no encores" was inflexibly adhered to.

The same Concert party (with the exception of Miss F. Davies), engaged by Miss Farler, at Bristol, on the 14th ult., gave a Concert at the Assembly Rooms, Bath, on the 11th ult., when the programme was mainly the same, and calls for no special remark.

The principal musical events in Exeter during the past month have been a Concert at the Victoria Hall by the artists of Mr. Mapleson's Opera Company, and Mr. Farley Sinkins' Subscription Concerts, which took place in the New Theatre, on Monday, the 21st ult. At the latter, the principal feature was the superb performance by a portion of the band of the Coldstream Guards (numbering about twenty), under the conductorship of Mr. C. Thomas. Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, Rossini's Overture to "William Tell," a selection from "Tannhäuser," and various smaller works were given in a manner which afforded great pleasure to the audience. The vocal portion of the programme was contributed by Mdlle. Marimon, Madame Sanderini, Miss Eleanor Rees, and Messrs. Henry Guy, Maybrick, and Farley Sinkins; and the pianoforte and violoncello solos by Signori Tito Mattei and Hegyesi added much to the interest of these excellent and very successful Concerts.

Miss Aylward gave two Chamber Concerts at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 15th ult., when she was assisted by Messrs. Burnett and Richardson (violins), Mr. J. S. Little (viola), and Mr. W. E. Whitehouse (violoncello); the vocalists being Miss Amy Aylward and Mr. Herbert Thorndike. The programme included Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat (Op. 12) and his C minor Trio; Schumann's Quintet in E flat (Op. 44), and Gade's Trio in A minor (Op. 29), &c. To Miss Aylward a special word of praise is due for the admirable way in which she performed her solos, two pieces by Henselt, Rubinstein's Barcarole, and a Mazurke and Romanze, by Rheinberger, for the left hand only.

A special Musical Service was held in St. Thomas's Church, Salisbury, on the 18th ult., when Part I. of Farmer's "Christ and His Soldiers" was excellently rendered by an augmented choir and full band. Mr. South (Cathedral Organist) presided at the organ, and Mr. Augustus Aylward (Organist of the church) conducted.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mr. Stavenhagen's Recital took place on the afternoon of January 22, in the Music Hall. The programme consisted of Beethoven's Sonatas in E minor (Op. 90) and in C sharp minor (Op. 27), Liszt's Variations on a theme by Bach, "Weinen und Klagen," and compositions by Liszt, Chopin, and Schumann (Papillons, Op. 2). The gifted artist interpreted the various compositions included in his selection in a masterly style.

On January 24 the sixth Choral Union Orchestral Concert took place; Mr. John Dunn was solo violinist, and performed Niels Gade's Concerto for violin and orchestra, and a Fantasia on "Otello," by Ernst. The remainder of the programme consisted of Schubert's "Rosamunde," Godard's Canzonetta in B flat, Hermann Goetz's Symphony in F, and Auber's Overture to "La Sirène." Miss Thudichum was vocalist, and sang very charmingly "Qui la voce," from "I Puritani," "The Tear," by Rubinstein, and "Im Herbst," by Robert Franz.

At the seventh Concert, on January 31, selections from Mackenzie's "Troubadour" and Berlioz's "Faust," Mozart's Symphony in D, and Max Bruch's Concerto for violin and orchestra were performed, and found much favour with the audience. Mr. Maurice Sons was solo violinist, and acquitted himself like a true artist in his rendering of the Concerto. Miss Agnes Janson's three songs included an admirable rendering of the popular Habanera, "L'amour est un oiseau," from "Carmen."

In aid of the Railway Guards' Widows' and Orphans' Fund, two Concerts were given on the evening of the 4th and the afternoon of the 5th ult. Popular vocal music constituted the chief part of the programme. The vocalists were Miss Annie Grey, Miss Adelaide Mullen, Miss Marian Williams, and Messrs. Bernard Lane, Bantock Pierpoint, and Thurley Beale. Miss Bertha Brousil contributed two violin solos in her usual finished style, and Mr. Wilhelm Ganz accompanied.

Mr. Henry Waller gave a Pianofore Recital in the Queen Street Hall, on the 5th ult. Among the compositions played by the Concert-giver were Schubert's Fantasia in C major, Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 13), and selections from Schumann, Chopin, and Liszt.

The last Orchestral Concert for this season, under the auspices of the Choral Union, took place on the evening of the 7th ult. Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser," Romance in C, from Mozart's Serenade for strings in G major, and Liszt's Rákoczy March, were the principal instrumental selections. Miss Amy Sherwin sang with great taste and finish a Recitative and Aria of Mozart, and Mr. John Probert gave "Dalla sua pace," from Don Giovanni. Beethoven's Choral Symphony (No. 9) completed the Concert. The task assigned to the members of the chorus in the Symphony was beyond their powers, and the music was only indifferently rendered. The soloists were, besides Miss Sherwin and Mr. Probert, Miss Annie Layton and Mr. Glencorse. Mr. Manns conducted.

An amateur Orchestral Concert was given on the evening of the 8th ult. The principal items of the programme were Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, and Goltermann's Concerto in D minor, for cello and orchestra, the cello part being ably interpreted by Mr. Carl Hamilton, the Conductor of the Society. Mrs. Ellis gave three songs, which were much appreciated.

A Concert, in connection with the annual Reid Festival, was given in the Music Hall, on the afternoon of Saturday, the 12th ult., thus affording us two opportunities of hearing Mr. Charles Hallé and his orchestra, whom Sir Herbert Oakeley had engaged for the occasion. Beethoven's Grand Overture in C ("Weihe des Hauses"), Schumann's Symphony in C major, selections from Rubinstein's "Bal Costumé," and an Entr'acte from "Lohengrin" were the principal orchestral numbers. Mr. Charles Hallé's solos were Chopin's Impromptu in F sharp, and Heller's "La Truite," besides the solo part of two movements of a Pianoforte Concerto, by Tschaikowski. Mr. Edward Lloyd gained great applause for his rendering of Handel's "Sound an alarm," a recitative and aria, from Halévy's "La Juive," and two Gipsy Songs, by Dvorák.

The Reid Concert proper took place on the evening of the 14th ult., and opened, as usual, with General Reid's Pastorale, Minuet, and March, played in memory of the composer, whose bequest affords Edinburgh this Concert. Spohr's Overture to "Jessonda," Chopin's Pianoforte Concerto in F minor, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in D, and the Overture to "William Tell" were the remaining orchestral numbers. Mr. Charles Hallé played the piano part of the Concerto. The vocalists were Miss Amy Sherwin and Mr. Edward Lloyd. Miss Sherwin sang a scena and aria from Weber's "Freischütz," and "Couplets du Mysoli," from David's "Perle du Brésil," and, as an encore, Sir Herbert Oakeley's setting of the Laureate's words, "Home they brought her warrior dead." Mr. Lloyd's selections were Beethoven's "Adelaide," and "Ad Amore," by Sir Herbert Oakeley, both being enthusiastically encored. The Concert was a lengthy one, but its success was undoubted, and it fully maintained the reputation it has earned as the event of our musical season.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND WEST OF SCOTLAND.

The Choral and Orchestral Series of Concerts ran on till the 12th ult. I need not give the particular dates of Concerts since my last letter, but may mention some of the principal musical works and selections performed. These were as follows:—Suite from Mackenzie's opera "The Troubadour,"—viz., Prelude to first act and Jeu de Paume, Masque Music and Entr'acte to act three, well executed and warmly received; Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, Mr. Sons, soloist; Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, finely performed; Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony; Paraphrase for Violin and Orchestra on Walther's prize song in "Die Meistersinger," the violin part played by all the violins; and Hungarian Rhapsody "Teleki," Liszt. In completion of a performance of the set of nine symphonies by Beethoven, the ninth was included in one of the last Concerts of the series. A better interpretation could hardly have been given of this stupendous conception, yet I cannot say that the audience enjoyed the Symphony as they undoubtedly had all the others of the set. The evident strain on the voices where these join, not to remark critically on this part of the work itself, took away from the enjoyment perhaps anticipated, and the feeling seemed to be one of relief rather when the whole was over. Miss Amy Sherwin, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. J. Probert, and Mr. A. Black were the quartet in the Symphony. The Overture to "Tannhäuser" was played at this Concert. Following this, the twelfth Subscription Concert, came a performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio "St. Paul." Taken altogether, a better rendition of this great work was never before given in this neighbourhood. The choruses were, as a rule, sung with nobility and refinement, due, in the first place, to the earnest and conscientious training of Mr. Allan Macbeth; the orchestra played with its accustomed skill, and the whole was under the experienced direction of Mr. Manns. The quartet of principals was the same as above, with the exception of Mr. W. H. Burgon as the bass.

Plebiscites were taken at the Saturday and Tuesday Concerts in regard to the music desired to be heard again on the last night of the season. Our audiences are pretty conservative, and cannot be got out of their old groove. As was to be expected, the Overtures to "Tannhäuser" and "William Tell," and the Pastoral Symphony, were highest in the voting, and these, with other selections in favour, were duly included in the programme on that occasion. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity, many who desired to be present being unable to gain admission. The audience was most enthusiastic, as may be supposed, and at the end of the Concert they recalled Mr. Manns again and again. Mr. Manns, who was evidently much gratified by this mark of confidence in and esteem for him, made a short speech, and said that he hoped to return in December next.

From one cause and another the Concerts have not been so successful, in a pecuniary sense, as they might have been, though latterly the attendance was all that could be wished. The reason of the want of success this year is not certainly to be found in any deterioration of the orchestra, in the character of the music brought forward, or even in the standing of the soloists, instrumental and vocal, engaged. The chief explanation no doubt lies in the evident disposition in the community to economise. I do not feel inclined to attribute much to the attacks on the scheme which have been persistently made by one or two of the local journals. The journals referred to are not important enough in standing to admit of their animadversions having had much, if any, influence on the mind of the public.

A Concert was given on the 18th ult. by the choir of Kilmalcolm Parish Church, when H. Farmer's Mass in B flat was performed. Mr. J. C. Fyfe conducted.

A performance of Haydn's Oratorio "The Creation" was given by the Paisley Choral Union, on the 14th ult., in the G. A. Clark Town Hall. There was a choir of two hundred and fifty voices and the orchestra numbered forty. Mr. J. Barr conducted.

The choir of Langside Free Church gave a very good performance of Jackson's Cantata "The Year," on the 11th ult. The Musical Association of Caledonia Road United Presbyterian Church gave a Concert, on the 15th ult., at which Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" was performed, with organ and vocal solos, anthems, &c. Mr. J. M. Kerr, Organist of the Church, conducted, and Mr. G. W. Hopper, of St. Mary's, Partick, accompanied on the organ.

The second of Mr. Cole's series of four Chamber Concerts was given on the 17th ult., in St. Andrew's (Berkeley) Hall. The programme comprised Mozart's String Quartet, No. 21, in D; Sonata for violin and piano, Rubinstein (Op. 19), first movement; also the Quintet, strings and piano, of Brahms (Op. 34), the latter a remarkably fine composition. Messrs. Cole, Iff, Daly, Walton, and A. Woolnoth (piano) were the executants, and Miss Sneddon was the vocalist.

The following arrangements have been made for the second half of the season: — Pollokshields Society, Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles"; Dennistoun Society, Such's "Narcissus and Echo"; Hamilton Choral Union, Cowen's "Rose Maiden"; the Normal School Association, under Mr. D. B. Johnstone, Dr. A. L. Peace's "St. John the Baptist."

The Wishaw Choral Union gave a performance of Gounod's Trilogy, "The Redemption," in the Town Hall, on the 3rd ult. The choir numbered over 100, and the orchestra about forty. Misses Adelaide Mullen and Annie Layton, Messrs. Bernard Lane and Bantock Pierpont were the principals; Mr. Robert Wardrop conducted, and Miss Gowans acted as organist. The performance was altogether a highly creditable one. The influence of music like "The Redemption" in such districts as Wishaw, where the surroundings and occupations are not by any means conducive to refinement, cannot be over-estimated.

MUSIC IN SOUTH WALES.

The principal Orchestral Concerts recently held took place at Cardiff, on the 2nd ult., and at Aberdare, on the 10th. At the former, the Cardiff Orchestral Society went through a varied programme at the Park Hall, in the presence of a large audience, the rendering of Haydn's "Farewell" Symphony being one of the leading features. The soloists were Miss Hilda Wilson and Mr. Barrington Foote, who were very well received; and Mr. Frank Lambert gave a clever performance on the violoncello. The Conductor was Mr. S. Fifoot, and the accompanist Mr. J. E. Deacon. The Aberdare Concert, the third promoted by the Aberdare Orchestral Society, was held at the Temperance Hall. It was attended with great success. There was a band of forty performers, under the leadership of Mr. T. Carrington, and several orchestral selections were given in a very creditable manner. The vocal artists were Miss Lizzie Williams, R.A.M., and Mr. John Henry, R.A.M. (in the absence of Mr. Henry George). Mr. F. Lambert, Cardiff, made a favourable impression as violoncello soloist, and Mr. James Livsey, Cardiff, was well received as cornet soloist. A. G. Crowe's Valse, "Little Sailors," was performed in characteristic fashion by thirty boys and girls from Park Schools; harp soloist, Miss A. T. Jones, R.A.M.; accompanist, Mr. W. J. Evans; Conductor, Mr. Charles Chew.

Mr. Dodd's Concerts at Cardiff have again been fairly patronised by the public. On the 10th ult. he paid a visit to Merthyr for the first time with several artists, and gave a Concert at the Temperance Hall. Miss Meredyth Elliot was exceedingly effective, and received an encore for each of her songs. Mr. Videon Harding, in "Maid of Athens" and "Queen of the Earth," was also encored. Signor Scanda, mandolinist, gave one or two artistic performances that were locally regarded as of a novel character. Signor Quaglia, who took part in several duets with him, and was specially noticeable for his light fingering of the piano, produced quite a sensation with his humorous Italian and French songs. Mr. Dodd was also applauded without stint for the manner in which he rendered several comic vocal sketches.

The annual Concert and distribution of awards to the students of the Musical College of Wales took place at Swansea, on the 4th ult. Mr. Jude, Liverpool, read his report as to the results of the examination, and complimented the principal, Dr. Parry, on the high state of proficiency attained by his pupils.

On the 7th ult. a Concert in aid of a charitable purpose was held at the Temperance Hall, Merthyr, at which the vocalists were—Miss Ruth Davies, Miss Lucy Clarke, Cardiff; Messrs. J. Richards, G. Jenkins, W. Phillips, and Sandford Jones. The Merthyr Orpheus Society, led by Mr. W. H. Powell, gave several selections. Miss P. M. Walker accompanied.

At Caersalem Chapel, Bargoed, on January 27, a performance of "Joshua" was given by the local Harmonic Society. The soloists were Madame Gertrude Lewis, Cardiff; Miss Marian Price, Mr. E. Hughes, and Mr. Gwilym Thomas, Porth. The orchestra was under the leadership of Mr. Roberts, Cardiff. Mr. H. P. D. Phillips was accompanist.

The annual Concert of the Zoar Harmonic Society, Merthyr, on the 17th ult., attracted a large audience. The orchestra was furnished by the Cyfarthfa String Band (Mr. G. C. Bowden), and the leading vocalists were Miss Nellie R. Rees, Miss Morgan, Mr. Dan Beddoe, and Mr. J. Williams, Mountain Ash. A short miscellaneous programme having been given, a rendering of Gaul's "Holy City" Cantata, followed. The choir was conducted by Mr. J. Sandbrook.

An Eisteddfod will take place at Bridgend on June 27. The chief prize will be £70 and a gold medal to the Conductor for the best rendering of "Come with torches" (Mendelssohn), and two guineas to every unsuccessful Conductor.

A special meeting of the Llandaff Diocesan Church Choral Association, called to consider the desirability of holding a Welsh Jubilee Festival at Llandaff Cathedral, took place on the 4th ult., at Cardiff, under the presidency of the Lord Bishop of Llandaff. A number of clergymen, besides Mr. Brooksbank, Organist of Llandaff Cathedral, and Mr. Thomas Williams, Organising Master to Welsh Choirs, were present. It was explained by the Rev. J. Rees, Pentyrch, near Cardiff, that the Dean of Llandaff had readily consented to grant the Cathedral for festival purposes in the morning. It was also proposed that there should be an Oratorio performance in the evening. Archdeacon Bruce, Newport, observed that a special Jubilee service would be held at the Cathedral, on June 20, and it would not be well to have one clashing with the other. Neither ought the Monmouthshire Annual Festival of the Parochial Choirs at the Cathedral to be pushed into a corner. After a discussion, it was agreed that the Annual Church Choral Festival should be held on July 14, and the special Jubilee Festival on August 17. It was also decided that the Oratorio to be performed should be "The Messiah." It is believed about 1,500 choristers will sing on these occasions, and it is intended to have orchestral as well as organ accompaniments, and to engage leading soloists. A committee is working out the details.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, February 10.

Operatic affairs are still uppermost in the minds of the musicians and music patrons of New York. The German season at the Metropolitan Opera House will be finished ere this is read, but its influences will remain not only in the American metropolis but throughout the country. The last month has added nothing to the list, the first performances during that period having all been revivals. The operas thus brought forward were "Fidelio," "Die Meistersinger," and "Rienzi." The greatest interest attached to the three performances of Beethoven's only opera, which for the first time in many years was received by the public with great enthusiasm. It occupied a place in the plans of Dr. Damrosch, when he undertook the experiment three years ago that has turned out to be so successful; but after three performances the efforts to rehabilitate it were abandoned. As in the case of "Tristan und Isolde," it was only put into the scheme this year because Herr Seidl, Herr Niemann, and Fräulein Lehmann pleaded earnestly for the privilege of interpreting it. Director Stanton held out against the request for a long time, meeting all arguments in favour of the work by a reference to the box-office record of three years ago, which showed that the last performance then had yielded only 500 dollars. Finally he consented again to make the experiment, and announced two representations, one with Fräulein Brandt as Leonore, the other with Fräulein Lehmann. The reception of the work was so enthusiastic that an extra performance was given (the Florestan in each case being Herr Niemann), at which the receipts, exclusive of the stockholders' subscriptions, amounted to 4,600 dollars. Since then, those who are given to seek explanations for musical phenomena have been busy putting forward grounds for the sudden change in feeling toward the much-loved, much-neglected, and much-misunderstood masterpiece. Undoubtedly the success was due in a great measure to the peculiar virility and dramatic intensity which Herr Seidl, and the artists with whose methods he is in such complete and hearty sympathy, infused into the work. The analogy between its interpretation and that which Herr Seidl has given the A major and C minor Symphonies was plain, and the enthusiastic acceptance of one work argued also the enthusiastic acceptance of the others. The revival of Wagner's "Meistersinger" has not been so successful, though the performances have in some respects, notably in the portrayal of the comedy element in the work, surpassed those of last year. The work came late, owing to the fact that the institution was left without a Walther by the failure of Herr Zobel. It was necessary that Herr Alvary should learn the part, and as he had also to "create" Merlin, the second Wagnerian novelty promised us, "Siegfried," has had to go by the board. Herr Niemann made an effort to rub up his recollection of the latter drama (which he studied in 1876 at the request of Wagner, but did not sing), but found it too much of a task, and as the management had brought forward "Tristan" without having promised it, and it showed a tendency to grow in public favour with each representation, "Siegfried" was postponed until next season.

The triumph of "Tristan und Isolde" has been so great that the artists themselves have not ceased to marvel at it. Last Monday evening it had its eighth representation, and the audience was the most numerous ever gathered inside the walls of the Opera House. Tickets in the hands of speculators brought from three to six times their fixed value. The occasion was the farewell of Herr Niemann, who set sail for Germany two days later, with the echoes of an ovation such as he had probably never received before ringing in his ears. Herr Niemann's departure was preceded by the re-entrance of Herr Anton Schott in "Rienzi." It is doubtful whether anything can work serious injury to the season at this late day, but in the interest of truthful history, it must be said that the revival of "Rienzi," and the return of Herr Schott, cannot be said to put an artistic crown on the work of the institution. There is only one view of the matter which makes the revival worthy of attention; it is interesting as affording an opportunity to those who find pleasure in studying the current of musical affairs, from the fact that coming after the enthusiastic reception of Wagner's masterpieces in comedy and tragedy, it affords a point of view from which to study the real feeling of the public toward the Wagnerian art. It is an open secret that Director Stanton, by the force of circumstances, was obliged to amend his plans touching the repertory, and practically to yield the list to Wagner. The propulsive force came from the treasurer's office. The plans to give ballet in grand style, and the representations of "Aïda" and "Merlin" had to be abandoned in order to satisfy the wishes of the public. When the season is ended we shall be in a position to discuss the sincerity of the appreciation which Wagner's works have called forth. At present we can no do more than say that, in point of popularity, as evidenced by the participation of the public, the list of operas at the end of the season will be headed by "Tristan und Isolde," with "Tannhäuser," second, and "Die Meistersinger," "Lohengrin," and "Die Walküre" above the first of the non-Wagnerian works. With this fact associate these other, namely, that in spite of the brilliancy of the Italian season at the Metropolitan Opera House four seasons ago, it cost Mr. Abbey a quarter of a million dollars, and that the owners of the Academy of Music, the old home of Italian opera, have advertised it to be sold, and the drift of American taste with respect to the lyric drama ought to become obvious enough.

On February 28, the German Company will yield the Metropolitan Opera House to the American (or, as it is now called, the National) Opera Company, for a season of five weeks. This season will bring forward one novelty, Rubinstein's "Nero," which is underlined for performance on March 7. The Company has occupied a good deal of space in the public prints because of its financial embarrassments, which are stupendous, and would have crushed the life out of any less hardy institution; but it has met with hearty support in its tour through the States, and its continuance is probable, if not certain. In operatic matters of the lighter sort, the only facts worthy of record are the astonishing prosperity of "Erminie" at the Casino, where it is nearing its 250th representation, and the failure of Farnie and Audran's "Indiana" at the Star Theatre, where it was brought forward by Mr. McCaull. Mr. Thomas's Popular Concerts will be resumed on February 22, by which time the public will be in a condition to appreciate the privilege of taking their eyes off operatic scenes. Unusual interest in orchestral performances has been aroused by the diversity in ideas of interpretation which has been exemplified thus far in the Concerts of Mr. Thomas, Mr. Van der Stucken, and Herr Seidl. To these we are now to have added three Concerts in Steinway Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Gericke. It is a question now whether this organisation is not, by virtue of its composition and the high degree of training to which Mr. Gericke has brought it, the finest band in the country, and the musicians and critics of New York are on the qui vive to learn whether the sceptre, which New York has wielded so long, is to pass over to Boston.

On February 26 Mr. Van der Stucken will bring out the most interesting novelty of the season, after "Tristan und Isolde." This is Berlioz's opera, "The Trojans in Carthage," which, in an adaptation made by H. E. Krehbiel, will be performed with an ample chorus and orchestra as a dramatic cantata. To fit it for such a performance, the work has been carefully pruned of ineffective material, and a feature has been added, the effect of which will be studied with interest. In place of dramatic action there will be a reciter, who, in the manner which in ancient times was admired, will relate such portions of the story of Æneas and Dido as are not comprised in the portions of the opera to be sung. These narrations have been written in blank verse and rhymed pentameters, and an effort has been made to adjust their melody and movement to the music with which they are brought in contact. The opera, as is well known, failed utterly when brought out in Paris at the Théâtre Lyrique, in 1863, for reasons which a study of the book and score and the musical character of the French make plain enough. If Mr. Van der Stucken wins appreciation for it in America, it will doubtless be because his excisions heighten its effectiveness, and that its undeniable beauties are of a kind that find more eloquent expression in the concert-room than in the theatre.

A multitude of minor matters crowd forward for mention, but considerations of time and space forbid. The performances of Gounod's "Redemption" in Boston, under the direction of Mr. Archer, and of Mr. Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty" in Cincinnati, under the direction of Mr. B. W. Foley, however, deserve record at least. In New York scarcely a day passes without a Concert deserving of serious consideration. Some of them are scarcely mentioned in the newspapers. Heretofore the cultivation of chamber music has been neglected here, but this season we have four excellent organisations engaged in its performance, and a quickening of interest in this respect seems likely to result from the growing custom of engaging these organisations for social receptions. The organists, too, have developed unexpected activity, and we have regular Concerts by Mr. Samuel P. Warren (facile princeps among American players), Mr. Gerrit Smith in the South Church, and Mr. John White in Chickering Hall. Mr. Warren's Recitals are in continuance of a project undertaken several years ago and never abandoned, to expound the entire body of organ literature to its lovers. I can do nothing better to show his methods than to reproduce at random one of his programmes that lies before me. Here it is:—

Mr. Warren's eightieth Organ Recital in Grace Church, January 27, 1887.—Choral Fugue, "Pignus futuræ," Mozart (transcribed by W. T. Best); "Ave Maria," Liszt; Sonata (No. 4, Op. 115), Merkel; Andante con moto in G minor, A. P. F. Boely; Postlude, J. E. West; Prière, A flat (Op. 56, No. 2), Guilmant; Scherzo Symphonique (Op. 55, No. 2), Guilmant.

OBITUARY.

The death is announced, at Paris, on the 9th ult., of M. Auguste Désiré Bernard Wolff, for thirty years head of the firm of Pleyel, Wolff et Cie. M. Wolff received a musical education at the Conservatoire, and rose to be a professor of the piano in that institution. But his mark was made not so much in playing upon the instrument as in perfecting its structure. He is credited with having invented some improvements, and having discerned the merits of others so far as to adopt them. The double escapement, short grands, over-stringing, metal bars, the transposing pedal, the tonal pedal, and the pedalier are all of them devices coming under one or other of the categories above named. Together they gave great distinction to M. Wolff's management of the firm, and enrolled his name among those of the men who have contributed most fully to the present perfection of the household instrument. M. Wolff had reached the age of sixty-five years.

The Westminster Orchestral Society gave the second of a series of three Concerts, on the 16th ult., at the Town Hall, Westminster, when several features of especial interest were presented in the programme. Amongst these must be named, in the first place, a performance of Beethoven's second Symphony, as satisfactory as it was highly creditable to an orchestral body consisting almost exclusively of amateurs. The production of Sir Arthur Sullivan's Violoncello Concerto in D major also deserves special mention, the work having been only once publicly performed (Signor Piatti played it at the Crystal Palace in 1866), and it remains as yet in manuscript. Although an early composition, the Concerto is well written for the instrument, and more especially in the second of its three movements (Andante expressivo) exhibits melodic charms which make it a matter of regret that it should not be more frequently heard. It was efficiently interpreted by Mr. J. Edward Hambleton. The proceedings of the evening also included the same composer's "Di Ballo" Overture, and the Allegretto grazioso from the incidental music to "Henry VIII." Master Gerald Walenn cleverly played a Scène de Ballet, by De Bériot, and Miss Blanche Murray and Mr. T. J. Grylls contributed vocal numbers. Mr. Charles Stewart Macpherson conducted with ability, and with the able and painstaking forces under his command the successful progress of the Society, now in its second season, would seem to be assured.

At the Hôtel Drouot, Paris, there was sold, on the 5th ult., the musical effects of the late M. Abel Boujour, a well known player and connoisseur of fine instruments. The principal objects of interest were two notable violoncellos by Stradivarius, and a bow by the celebrated Francis Tourte—the latter a unique specimen, being as perfect as the day it left the maker's hands—the stick an octagon, mounted in tortoiseshell and gold. This lot brought the highest price yet paid for a bow at a public auction, being knocked down to the English dealer, Hill, of Wardour Street, for the sum of £44. The Stradivarius violoncellos, which were of the early period, and not remarkable specimens, fetched high prices. Both were exhibited as part of the French contribution by the deceased owner in the "Historic Music Loan Collection" in the gallery of the Royal Albert Hall, 1885, and attracted there some attention. The one bearing date 1689 realised the sum of £760, and was purchased by M. Delsart (Professor at the Conservatoire). The other, dated 1691, was bought by an agent of M. Hollmann (the well known violoncellist) for the sum of £480. A Francesco Ruggerius violoncello fetched the sum of £128. It is instructive to notice the increased number of Stradivarius instruments now purchased by performers.

The second Concert of the Highbury Philharmonic Society for the present season, was given on January 31, at the Highbury Athenæum, before a large audience. The programme comprised Villiers Stanford's Cantata, "The Revenge," and Randegger's "Fridolin." Both works were well rendered. "The Revenge" is now well-known to the majority of London musicians, and the better it is known the more it is liked. In "Fridolin" the solos were taken by Madame Farnol, Mr. Bridson, Mr. Frank Ward, and Mr. Charles Banks (a pupil of Mr. Holland), all of whom were highly efficient. The choir, of about 100 voices, was numerically hardly powerful enough for the large orchestra, but the members endeavoured to make up this deficiency by extra vigour, and they also sang with due attention to light and shade. The most successful of the choral numbers were the Chorus of Handmaidens, by the ladies of the choir, and the Dramatic Chorus of Smiths, by the male voices. The band played the difficult accompaniments in both works effectively, and Mr. G. H. Betjemann conducted with firmness and care.

Miss Madeline Hardy gave her annual Concert on Monday evening, the 14th ult., at Brixton Hall, in the presence of a crowded audience. The bénéficiaire was assisted by Miss Ethel Winn, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Rhoda Sutherland (pupil of the Concert-giver), Mr. John Probert, Mr. S. Santon, Mr. James Budd, Mr. Richard Temple, Miss Kate Chaplin (violin), Mr. G. T. Miles (harp), Mr. A. E. Godfrey (organ), and Miss Kate Cheyne (pianoforte). Miss Hardy met with a hearty reception for each of her selections, which included Felicien David's "Charmant Oiseau" and Cecile Hartog's "The year's at the Spring." Madame Sterling was greeted with enthusiasm, special mention being due to her clever rendering of Dr. A. C. Mackenzie's new song "A dear wifey," a composition perfectly worthy of the well-known composer. Mr. Sidney Naylor and Mr. A. H. Fox accompanied.

The Association of Lay Helpers held their annual Festival on Monday evening, the 21st ult., in St. Paul's Cathedral. The Service commenced with the processional hymn, "Onward, Christian Soldiers," in which (as also subsequently in the Anthem) two trombones and a cornet were used to support the voices, in addition to the organ, with an exceedingly good effect. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Cooke in G, and the Anthem consisted of the last three movements of the "Woman of Samaria," namely, the tenor air "His salvation is nigh them that fear Him," and the two concluding choruses "I will call upon the Lord" and "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel." The whole of the music was sung with great precision and steadiness and correctness of intonation by the amalgamated choirs. Dr. G. C. Martin (the choirmaster of the Association) presided at the organ, and Mr. C. E. Miller conducted.

The three prizes of £3, £2, and £1 offered by the Committee of the Manchester Sunday School Union, for original Sunday School Hymn Tunes, suitable for insertion in their selection of Festival Hymns for Whitsuntide, &c., 1887, have been awarded as follows:—The first to Caleb Simper, Organist of St. Mary Magdalene, Worcester, for his setting of "How calmly the evening"; the second to Dr. William Spark, of Leeds, for his setting of "God o'er all the earth is King"; and the third to W. B. Bell, Organist of St. Stephen's, Elton, Bury, Lancashire, for his setting of "Awake, for the trumpet is sounding." The number of tunes sent in was 790, and the number of competitors 232.

The fourth annual re-union and dinner of the Musical Fraternity of Brighton, took place at the Criterion, West Street, on the 12th ult., Mr. Frank J. Sawyer in the chair. A large number of toasts were proposed, and excellent speeches were made by some of the eminent musicians present, amongst whom was Mr. F. Corder, who, after thanking the company for proposing his health, said that he hoped to reside in Brighton to the end of his life. A musical entertainment was given during the evening, in which Messrs. Kuhe, Corder, Dr. Shadwell, Messrs. G. Crook, T. Albery, G. Cole, W. H. Judd, H. Trist, and A. Galloway took part.

At the last monthly meeting of the Musical Association, held on the 7th ult., Dr. W. H. Monk in the chair, Dr. C. W. Pearce read a paper "On the treatment of Ancient Ecclesiastical Melodies in Modern Instrumental Composition." Dr. Pearce gave an interesting account of the derivation of these ancient tones; he showed the use to which they were put in the Mediæval Church, and answered certain objections that have been raised against their modern use. Some ingenious illustrations adapted by Dr. Pearce for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello were performed by himself, Master P. V. Sharmann, and Mr. E. Woolhouse. The skilful way in which Dr. Pearce had interwoven the various melodies in these trios met with much approval from the members present. On the conclusion of the paper, a discussion took place, in which Sir George Grove, Mr. G. A. Osborne, Mr. T. L. Southgate, the Chairman, and others joined.

A Concert was given by Mr. Frederick Bevan at Brixton Hall, on Monday evening, the 7th ult., when he appeared in the dual capacity of singer and composer. As the former, Mr. Bevan earned warm manifestations of approval by his interpretation of Sullivan's "Thou'rt passing hence," Weiss's "Village Blacksmith," and, as an encore, "The Vicar's Song," from Sullivan's "Sorcerer." Mr. Bevan's only composition in the programme was his new song "Watching and Waiting," for which Miss Eleanor Rees obtained a well merited encore. The remaining artists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Ethel Winn, Miss Lena Law, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Edward Dalzell, Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte), Herr Poznanski (violin), and Mr. Turle Lee (accompanist). Part-music was fairly rendered by the members of the St. George's Glee Union, under the direction of Mr. J. Monday.

Mr. Charles Dowdeswell, joint Hon. Sec. of the Wagner Society, delivered the second of his course of lectures upon Richard Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelung," at the Surrey Conservatoire of Music, at Clapham, on the 1st ult. The subject of the discourse was "The Walkyrie," which was subjected to a detailed analysis, in the course of which some of the more obscure passages of the poem were elucidated. An extract from the "Mahabharata" was read as bearing upon the second scene of Act II. During the evening a large part of Act II. and the final scene were well rendered by Miss Clara Leighton, Messrs. Tapley and Hoefler. A well-known amateur pianist, who manifested singular verve and insight into Wagner's intentions, played the difficult accompaniments. The subject of the next lecture is "Siegfried," when the "Waldweben" and "Awakening of Brunnhilde" will be given.

The West London Male Voice Union gave its second Smoking Concert this season on the 5th ult., at Ladbroke Hall, Notting Hill, which was filled to overflowing. The programme consisted of solos, part-songs, and glees—"Go, idle boy," "L'ape e la Serpe," "Phillis dyes her tresses black," and Dr. Bridge's setting of Tennyson's quaint poem "The Goose" being the most successful. The execution of the various pieces by the choir showed that much care had been bestowed on the rehearsals by the able Conductor, Mr. Albert Reakes. The soloists were Mr. Charles Chilley and Mr. Vaughan Edwardes, both of whom were in excellent voice. Two violin solos, Andante (de Beriot) and "L'Aragonesa" (Alard), were given with good effect by Mr. Percy Webster. Mr. F. G. Cole, F.C.O., ably presided at the piano.

Mr. W. G. Wood's second Organ Recital in the Presbyterian Church of England, Crouch Hill, took place on the 24th ult. Mr. Wood's selections comprised Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Mendelssohn's Sonata in F minor, compositions by Smart, Lemmens, Batiste, &c., and an "Allegro in form of Minuet," of his own, and played for the first time. The choir of the church sang "Lift up your heads" ("Messiah"), and Barnby's "O how amiable."

Madame de Pachmann (Maggie Okey) made a very successful début in Berlin last month. Her performance was received with great favour, and the Crown Princess personally congratulated the English artist upon its character. Mr. and Madame de Pachmann will return to England in May, but it is not expected that the Russian pianist will appear in public.

The Committee of the Maas Memorial Fund recently held their final meeting at Beaufort House, Strand, Mr. Joseph Bennett in the chair. The Hon. Secretary, Mr. Charles Lyall, reported that the fund amounted to £558 9s., of which £259 17s. 7d. was absorbed by the monument and incidental expenses, leaving a balance of £298 11s. 5d. The Committee unanimously resolved to invest this amount in government or corporation stock, and with the proceeds found an annual "Maas Memorial Prize," to be awarded, after competition, to the best tenor singer at some public school of music. Messrs. J. Bennett, G. H. Johnstone, W. A. Barrett, and C. Lyall were appointed trustees.

The members of the Grosvenor Choral Society held their 180th monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, on Friday, the 18th ult. The first part consisted of a miscellaneous selection, the solo vocalists being Madame Wilson-Osman, Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, Mr. W. Powell, Mr. Barton, and Mr. W. C. Burridge. Hofmann's Cantata "The Legend of the Fair Melusina" formed the second part. This was very successfully rendered both by choir and soloists, the characters of Melusina and Count Raymond being given with striking dramatic effect by Madame Wilson-Osman and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. Mrs. T. P. Frame presided at the piano, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

The Easter Eisteddfod at Abergavenny promises to be a great success, notwithstanding the counter attractions at Pontypool and other places on Easter Monday. The Marquis of Abergavenny has consented to act as president for the day. The musical adjudicators are Mr. E. H. Turpin, London; Mr. Emlyn Evans, Hereford; Mr. C. C. Caird and Mr. Throne Biggs, Abergavenny. There are three prizes for the principal event—£100 and gold medal, £75 and silver medal, and £50. Mr. T. P. Price, M.P., gives £10 for harp playing, and Major Herbert offers £5 5s. for the quartet "Ar-hyd-y nos."

We are informed that the Academical Board of Trinity College, London, has decided to apply to its musical faculty the system of correspondence classes which has of late become so popular in other departments of education. Musical students living in remote districts will be admitted to the harmony and other theory classes on the same terms as students actually attending the College, will go through the same systematic course of preparation for the College examinations and those of the Universities, and will rank according to their respective standing with the regular students of the College.

A Concert was given at the Lancaster Hall, Notting Hill, on the 9th ult., by Mr. Norman Abbott. Songs were effectively rendered by Madame Minnie Gwynne, Miss Wilhelmina Percy, and Messrs. C. E. Deane, E. J. Field, and Sydney Beckley; and Miss Lilly von Kornatski achieved great success in pianoforte solos by Stephen Heller. A feature of the evening was the violin playing of Miss Clara Titterton, R.A.M., who in David's Andante and Capriccio, and two solos by Papini, exhibited great breadth of style, pure intonation, and much feeling. Mr. Norman Abbott was an efficient accompanist.

Pattison's Cantata "John Bull and his Trades," was performed in character by the Wycliffe Chapel Choir, London, at their "At Home," on Friday, the 11th ult., under the direction of the Choirmaster, Mr. George Merritt, G.T.S.C. An enthusiastic audience testified by repeated applause to the excellent rendering of the work, which was accompanied by Miss Bonallack, G.S.M., who with Miss Merritt, Mr. C. H. Rowcliffe, and Mr. Merritt played Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," a selection from Gounod's "Faust," and a "Galop di Bravura," by Schulhoff.

On the 1st ult., a Concert was given at St. George's Mission Room, Kensington, in aid of the Sunday School Fund. The vocalists were Miss Adelaide Mullen, Mrs. Harris, Miss Patti Winter, Mr. A. Lennox Hill, Mr. Lion, and Mr. Henry Beaumont. A violin solo was given by Herr Karl Ryall, two flute solos by Mr. George Ham, who gave considerable promise as a flautist, and a pianoforte solo by Miss Eugenie Caverhill-Shiels. Mr. G. F. Huntley conducted.

A successful Concert was given, under the direction of Herr F. Von Zastrow, at the Kensington Town Hall, on the 16th ult., before a numerous audience. The artists who assisted were Miss José Sherrington, Miss Berta Foresta, Madame Madge Inglis, Mr. William Nicholl, Mr. John Bridson, Chevalier Robbia (pupil of Paganini, and Court violinist to H.M. the Queen of Spain and H.M. the Emperor of the Brazils), and Mr. Alfred Allen, who, besides officiating as accompanist, contributed three pianoforte solos. Miss Sherrington and Mr. Nicholl were highly successful in their solos.

Miss Maud Cameron gave her Annual Concert at the Surry Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on Monday, the 14th ult. The bénéficiaire was in good voice, and sang Sullivan's "Thou art weary" so well that a hearty encore resulted. The following artists assisted:—Miss Bertha Moore, Miss Matilda Roby, Miss May Hughes, Madame Raymond; Messrs. Reginald Groome, Arthur Weston, Frederick H. Cozens, James Budd, and Alfred Grieve; solo pianoforte, Madame Emily Tate; solo violin, Mr. S. Oakley Parrott. Mr. John Harrison played the accompaniments in his usual faultless style.

The applications from candidates for Open Scholarships at the Royal College of Music are as follows:—Singing (five scholarships), 182 candidates; Pianoforte (four scholarships), 221 candidates; Organ (one scholarship), eighteen candidates; Violin (two scholarships), seventy-five candidates; Violoncello (one scholarship), six candidates; Composition (one scholarship), nine candidates. The preliminary examinations are to take place at local centres on the 2nd inst., and the final examination at the College towards the end of the month.

The Examination for the Degree of Doctor in Music at the University of Oxford, and the Second Examination for the Degree of Bachelor in Music, will be held in October next. For the last-named examination, in addition to the usual subjects, there will be required a critical knowledge of Beethoven's "Fidelio" (including E major Overture only) and Mozart's Symphony in E flat. All exercises are to be sent to the Professor of Music, Sir Frederick A. Gore Ouseley, St. Michael's, Tenbury, as early as possible. None can be received after the end of June.

The Woodside Park Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," on the 17th ult., at Woodside Hall, North Finchley, under the direction of Mr. Alfred J. Dye, A.Mus. The soloists were Miss Mary Beare, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. Percy Palmer, and Mr. Bridson, all of whom acquitted themselves admirably. The chorus consisted of eighty voices, and the accompaniments were well rendered by a professional string quartet, led by Mr. S. Dean Grimson. Mr. J. G. Callcott presided at the harmonium, and Mrs. Williams at the piano.

The prospectus of the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Robert Taylor, announces three Concerts for the season 1887. At the first, on the 31st inst., Beethoven's Mass in C and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" will be performed; at the second, on June 16, selections from Haydn's "Creation," Handel's "Coronation" Anthem, and Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch"; and at the third, on November 10, Costa's "Eli." The leader of the band is Mr. W. Baker, and Mr. J. Spearing, jun., presides at the organ.

The members of the Holborn Choral Society, gave the first Concert of their second season in the Holborn Town Hall, on the 10th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of Prout's Cantata "Alfred," which was extremely well rendered, the solo vocalists being Miss Chapuy, Mr. Thurley Beale, and Mr. W. Price. The second part was miscellaneous; the vocalists were Miss Chapuy, Miss A. Brooks, Mr. Hutchinson, and Mr. A. Greenwood. Mr. Tobias Matthay contributed pianoforte solos, and Mr. Webster a solo on the organ.

At the new Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, on the 5th ult., Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and a miscellaneous selection were performed. The solo vocalists were Mesdames Pauline Cramer and Clara West, Messrs. A. Kenningham and P. Lewis; leader of the band, Mr. Zerbini; organist, Mr. D. Callow; Conductor, Mr. G. D. Winter.

A Musical and Dramatic Recital was given on the 15th ult., at the Nineteenth Century Art Galleries, when Mrs. Chillingham Hunt ably played pianoforte pieces, by Reinecke, Liszt, and Godard; and Mrs. M. A. Carlisle was much applauded in vocal solos, by Pratt, Marzials, Campana, and others. Mr. Chillingham Hunt, who contributed a number of dramatic recitations, including scenes from "Hamlet" and from "The School for Scandal," met with a full measure of appreciation on the part of a numerous and critical audience.

We understand that arrangements have been made for the four Concerts of the newly-formed Electro Harmonic Society. They will be given in the Banquet-room of St. James's Hall, on the evenings of the 25th inst., April 29, May 27, and June 24. The last date has been fixed with the idea that many electricians from the Colonies and British dependencies will then be present in London in connection with the Jubilee celebration, and that this will be an opportunity for friendly meeting between them and their English confrères.

On Thursday, the 17th ult., a performance of Handel's "Jephtha" was given at the Assembly Hall, Mile End, by the Handel Society, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker. The solo parts were entrusted to Misses Marian Fenna, Griffiths, and Paget; Messrs. Probert and Wing. The excellent rendering of the choruses bore testimony to the zeal and intelligence of the director; the orchestral accompaniments were generally well played, and the performance throughout reflected credit on the Society. Mr. E. G. Croager presided at the organ.

A prospectus of the Highbury New Park School of Music, at the Highbury Athenæum, seems to promise an excellent institution for the high class training of students in that district. The list of professors is extremely good in every department, and the appointment of Mr. Charles Fry shows that the important item of Elocution will be carefully attended to. The principal is Mr. Oscar Kronke, and the examiners Mr. W. A. Barrett and Mr. Ebenezer Prout, Mr. Barrett being also named as Musical Lecturer.

Signor Mancinelli's "Isaiah," to be produced at the Norwich Festival in October next, is a dramatic Cantata. Among the personages who figure in it are the Prophet, King Hezekiah, and Sennacherib, as well as several imaginary characters. The music is set to a Latin text, which will be rendered into English by Mr. Joseph Bennett. Messrs. Chappell and Co. have secured the work for England.

The Smoking Concert, on the 12th ult., at the Peckham Conservative Club, was under the direction of Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock, who played a Mazurka by Pessard, and a Tarantelle by Moszkowski. He was assisted by Mr. James Budd (who was successful in a new song by Molloy, "The Lads in Red"), Messrs. Henry Yates, J. R. Jekyll, F. Budge, W. H. Simons, E. Watkins, W. G. Hazelgrove, and Musgrove Tufnail. There was a crowded attendance.

Mr. H. W. Weston, F.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster of Balham Parish Church, gave an Organ Recital on the new Organ at St. Barnabas', Kentish Town, on the 19th ult. The programme included Mendelssohn's Third Organ Sonata; a Fugue on the name "Bach," by Schumann; a Passacaille, by Couperin; and works by Handel, Rheinberger, Stephens, Lemaire, and Ravina. Madame Wilson-Osman was the vocalist, and Mr. Weston accompanied.

Mr. Wm. Carter gave a Scotch Concert at the Albert Palace, on the 12th ult. His spirited Ode "Victoria," served to introduce a new tenor, Mr. Philip Tomes, who should prove an acquisition to concert-givers. Madame Antoinette Sterling and Mr. Ernest Birch met with a flattering reception, and Mr. Carter's Choir sang some excellent Scotch glees.

We are informed by Mr. Charles Lunn, whose fifth edition of his work, "The Philosophy of Voice," has now been for some time before the public, that he is desirous of adding some important matter on the subject in a sixth edition, which he hopes shortly to publish.

Mr. Joseph Bennett has accepted the post of musical adjudicator at the Eisteddfod to be held in Dolgelley on New Year's Day next.

The Queen has accepted the dedication of a Jubilee Anthem, written by Dr. J. F. Bridge, and has approved of its being included in the Jubilee Service to be held in Westminster Abbey. The Anthem was performed some time ago before the Queen at Osborne by part of the Abbey Choir, under the direction of the composer. It will be published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. shortly.

On the 21st ult., a Concert was given at the Lecture Rooms, Stoke Newington, by Miss McDonnell and Miss Kate Milner. The vocalists were Miss Florence Monk, Miss Susetta Fenn, Miss Kate Milner, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, Mr. Lovett King, and Mr. H. Prenton. Miss McDonnell and Miss Farries presided at the piano. A long and well selected programme gave much pleasure to the audience.

Miss Lydia Davis gave her second Concert at Bolingbroke Hall, Battersea, on the 18th ult. The artists were Madame Wilson-Osman, Miss Hellaby, Miss Lydia Davis, and Mr. Tom Maude; and the work, Howell's Cantata "Song of the Months," was effectively rendered by Miss Lydia Davis's Choir. Mr. Knott, A.R.A.M., was an able Conductor.

Mr. Alfred Probert gave his first Annual Ballad Concert on the 7th ult., at Myddleton Hall, Islington, assisted by Miss Amy Sargent, Miss Ethel Harwood, Miss Annie West, Mr. M. Ryan, Mr. Alfred Probert, Signor Villa, Mr. Ernest Probert, and the Arion Glee Club; pianists, Mr. Churchill Sibley and Mr. Alfred Cox.

The Stratford Musical Festival, for the encouragement of the study and practice of music, is announced to be held in the Town Hall on April 30 and May 2. Competitions in the several branches of the art are set forth in the prospectus, as usual; and the distribution of prizes, concert, &c., will take place on May 3. The judges are Messrs. Fountain Meen, Ebenezer Prout, and Frederick E. Walker.

The Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, have recently given the following performances:—On January 26, "The Messiah," at St. Augustine's, Bermondsey; on the 2nd ult., "Elijah," at St. Stephen's, Poplar; and on the 16th ult., "Samson," at Christ Church, Watney Street. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ on each occasion.

If it be true, as reported, that the manager of La Scala has failed, the disaster should, probably, be ascribed to "Otello," which has killed every other attraction of the season. Till that opera was brought out, people reserved themselves for it, leaving the theatre empty. The two performances since given can have gone but a little way to make up for lost ground.

Special Services will take place at the Church of St. Marylebone on each Thursday evening in Lent. Dr. Stainer's new Cantata, "The Crucifixion," was performed at the opening service on the 24th ult., and will be repeated on the 10th and 24th inst., and April 8. A selection from Gounod's "Redemption" will be sung on the 3rd, 17th, and 31st inst.

Her Majesty the Queen has graciously accepted a copy of the Jubilee Cantata "The Victorian Age," set to music by Mr. J. L. Roeckel, the words by Mr. F. E. Weatherly, M.A., lately published by Messrs. Curwen and Sons.

Mr. Carl Armbruster completed his interesting course of lectures on "Modern composers of Classical Song" at the Royal Institution, on the 19th ult., the attendance throughout having been a very good one, and the lecturer's discourse meeting with much appreciation.

Dr. A. H. Mann has written a Jubilee Te Deum for orchestra, organ, and chorus, which will be performed at King's College, Cambridge, and also at Beverley Minster, in both cases with orchestra.

As a report of the death of Mr. A. Fowles is in circulation in England, we are requested by him to state that he is living, and principal bass at the New American Church, Avenue de l'Alma, Paris.

Bach's "Passion" (St. John) will be given with orchestral accompaniments, at Holy Trinity Church, Stroud Green, N., on three evenings in Lent—viz., 16th, 23rd, and 30th inst. The admission to the church will be free.

The second performance of Verdi's "Otello" took place on Sunday, the 13th ult., the composer being present. It is described as of better quality than the first, and as received with acclamations. Verdi once more obtained the highest honours at the hands of his countrymen.

We understand that Sir Arthur Sullivan's Cantata "The Golden Legend" will be performed twice in Berlin during Holy Week, under the composer's direction. It is hoped that Madame Albani may be induced to sing in it.

Gounod's "Mors et Vita" will be sung at St. Stephen's, South Kensington, on the Friday evenings in Lent, at eight o'clock, with orchestral accompaniment. The harp accompaniment will be played by Mr. Cheshire.

For the forthcoming Jubilee of Her Majesty, we are informed that Dr. Bradford is writing a Sacred Cantata, entitled "The Song of Jubilee," for solo voices, chorus, orchestra, and organ.

We are pleased to be able to state that Mr. Carrodus, who left England for Monte Carlo, at the end of January, has returned much benefited in health, and will at once resume his professional duties.

REVIEWS.

The Crucifixion. Words selected and written by the Rev. J. Sparrow-Simpson. Music by J. Stainer. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

When Dr. Butler preached his memorable sermon on the beneficent influence of music, in September last at Gloucester, he probably had no idea that he was indirectly pleading for the foundation of a new style or school of sacred composition. That our cathedrals and churches should be more extensively utilised than formerly for musical performances—or rather services—is a proposition with which all, save those who still retain antiquated prejudices, will agree. But then the question arises—what kind of works should be selected for gatherings specially intended for the "common people"? In the nature of things, performances of standard oratorios with full orchestra and a large choir, can only be given at infrequent intervals, and though the most rigid musical purists could not object to selections rendered with only organ accompaniment and a miniature chorus, yet a feeling of regret that the masterpieces of the great composers should be presented with maimed rites is inevitable. The logical conclusion is, therefore, that works specially written for the services of song now being organised on all sides should be invited, and a new field for the exercise of our leading composers' abilities thereby opened up. As a type of what such works should be, Dr. Stainer's "Crucifixion" will naturally command attention apart from its own intrinsic merits. Structurally, it is as simple as possible. Only two solo voices are required, a tenor and a bass, and no orchestra is needed, the accompaniments being specially written for the organ only. As in the Passions of Bach, hymns are introduced in which the audience or congregation can join. Lastly, "the performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable address if thought advisable." The work is described as "a Meditation on the sacred passion of the Holy Redeemer," and Mr. Sparrow-Simpson's book follows the lines of the first part of Gounod's "Redemption," except that there is no prologue. We fancy the influence of the French master may be traced in the nature of the text. The language of Scripture is frequently utilised, but by no means closely followed; and, speaking generally, the lines are characterised by extreme pietism and glowing sentiment, especially in the hymns. As an example of the author's fervid style, we quote a few lines from a hymn entitled "The Mystery of the Divine Humiliation":—

Once the Lord of brilliant seraphs,
Winged with love to do His will,
Now the scorn of all His creatures,
And the aim of every ill.

* * * * *

From the "Holy, Holy, Holy,"
We adore Thee, O most High,
Down to earth's blaspheming voices,
And the shout of "Crucify."

Cross of Jesus, Cross of Sorrow,
Where the blood of Christ was shed,
Perfect man on thee was tortured,
Perfect God on thee has bled!

But though Mr. Sparrow-Simpson is intensely earnest, he never degenerates into the objectionable realistic style adopted by some hymn writers of the present day, and there is nothing in his book to offend either churchman or dissenter. Turning to the music, the first feature which strikes our attention is the singularly happy union of artistic feeling with simplicity. Dr. Stainer has fully studied the capacities of ordinary church choirs, and yet has contrived to impart a flavour of high-class musicianship to almost every number. A brief survey of the score will serve to confirm this statement. After a few bars of introduction in C sharp minor, the tenor commences the narration, which quickly yields to No. 2, "The Agony." In this the Redeemer is personified by the bass soloist, the chorus responding in beautiful though subdued accents. The narration is then resumed in a kind of accompanied Recitative, full of melodic interest and happy turns of harmony. Especially effective is the use of the "Neapolitan sixth," at the words "scourged Him." In the next number, entitled "Processional to Calvary," we are specially reminded of "The Redemption." The points of resemblance are the key, A minor, and the mixture of instrumental writing with chorus and soli. But whereas Gounod's March is designedly brusque, that of Dr. Stainer is tender and sad for the most part, and after an effective climax it dies away pianissimo. Passing over Nos. 4 and 6 (narration) and No. 5 (the hymn quoted above), we come to a somewhat remarkable tenor air "King ever glorious." In this, the key and measure are changed every few bars, and yet the music is not in the least patchy. The climax is really fine, and, well sung and accompanied, this solo could not fail to make a marked impression. The next important number is an unaccompanied chorus, "God so loved the world," which is extremely well written, though perhaps it is less original than the foregoing. From here to the end the music increases in interest. After an expressive "Litany of the Passion" for the choir and congregation, there is a beautiful duet for the soloists "So Thou liftest Thy divine petition," which Spohr might have signed. The composer has here surpassed all his previous efforts, but he has yet something finer in reserve. This is virtually the final chorus "From the throne of His cross," a piece strongly rhythmical, and written in plain four-part throughout, yet intensely expressive. The earnest pleading character of the music at the words "O come unto Me," is even more striking than Gounod's treatment of the same or similar lines. After the Narrator has described the closing scene of the awful tragedy, the work ends with a hymn "All for Jesus." To assert that Dr. Stainer's Cantata—for so we suppose it must be termed—will be in extensive demand, is to utter a perfectly safe prediction. Structurally, technically, and artistically, it is precisely suited to its purpose.

Introduction and Allegro for the Organ. Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat. By W. G. Wood. [Weekes and Co.]

MR. WOOD might have given his organ piece a less modest and indefinite appellation. It is virtually an overture, or the first movement of a sonata, being in strict form, and worked out with considerable elaboration of the subject-matter. The themes are well contrasted, and the general style is modern, yet broad and dignified. Somewhat too long for a church voluntary it would make an extremely effective item in a recital programme. The qualities noted above are also found in the setting of the evening canticles. It is eminently church-like and yet flowing and melodious, and may be briefly described as one of the best services which have come under our notice for some time.

Les Mendelssohn-Bartholdy et Robert Schumann. Par Ernest David, Lauréat de l'Institut. [Paris: Calmann Lévy.]

IN reference to M. David's volume, the reviewer has a disagreeable but perfectly straightforward task to perform, that of exposing a very gross case of wholesale and unacknowledged pilfering. The chapters on the Mendelssohn family consist of copious extracts from the letters and family records published in 1879 by Mendelssohn's nephew, Herr Sebastian Hensel, strung together by a slender narrative largely borrowed from Sir George Grove's admirable article, and supplemented by a translation of Mr. Henry Chorley's account of his last meeting with Mendelssohn given in his volume "Modern German Music." This last loan is acknowledged—not so the liberal extracts to which M. David has helped himself from Sir George Grove's article—with the exception of one anecdote. Where M. David introduces any original matter he is generally incorrect. Thus he confuses Sarah Austin with Jane Austen, speaks of Mr. Chorley as the editor of the Athenæum, and gives the following apocryphal illustration of Mendelssohn's dislike of national airs, on page 95. "Il ne fit usage qu'une seule fois de mélodie populaire, dans le but de flatter la reine Victoria: c'est dans la fin de sa symphonie écossaise, dédiée à cette princesse, et même cette unique tentative n'est pas très heureuse; car cette mélodie ne s'accorde en rien avec ce qui la précède: elle arrive on ne sait pourquoi et déconcerte l'auditeur. Mendelssohn n'a adapté cette mélodie à sa symphonie que pour justifier le titre d'Ecossaise qu'il lui donna." As if, apart from the incorrectness of the statement, the whole work was not redolent of the Highlands! In these chapters on the Mendelssohn family, however, M. David has some lingering shreds of compunction as to the duty of acknowledging his sources of information. But when he comes to deal with Schumann he casts all shame aside and has palmed off as an original "biographical study" of that composer, a close translation—barring a few gratuitous blunders—of Herr Spitta's article in Grove's Dictionary. There is no word of acknowledgment from beginning to end of the article, but at the conclusion of the whole book, he has had the sublime assurance to print the list of Schumann's works "d'après la liste dressée par M. Philipp Spitta pour le 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians' de Sir G. Grove," as though in proof of his honesty. Here again, as in the case of Mendelssohn, M. David's meagre additions to his loans are generally irrelevant or incorrect. Such a work suggests curious reflections on the morality of the author, his poor opinion of the intelligence of his readers, and his sovereign contempt for the castigation that is sure to befall him at the hands of his more scrupulous colleagues.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE following anecdote anent the origin of Verdi's new opera, recorded in the Corriere del Mattino, may be given a place in these columns: "Verdi," says the journal quoted, "was first induced to undertake the composition of 'Otello' on the occasion of his 'Messa da Requiem' at La Scala, for the benefit of the sufferers by the inundations at Ferrara. The next day he gave a dinner to the four principal solo singers, at which were present several friends, among them Signor Faccio and Signor Ricordi. The latter laid siege to the Maestro, trying to persuade him to undertake a new work. For a long time Verdi resisted, and his wife declared that probably only a Shakespearian subject could induce him to take up his pen again. A few hours later, Faccio and Ricordi went to Boito, who at once agreed to make the third in the generous conspiracy, and two days after sent to Verdi a complete sketch of the plan for the opera, following strictly the Shakespearian tragedy. Verdi approved of the sketch, and from that moment it fell to the part of Giulio Ricordi to urge on the composer and the poet by constant reminders. Every Christmas he sent to Verdi's house an 'Otello' formed of chocolate, which, at first very small, grew larger as the opera progressed. Verdi did not wish to include choruses in his opera, but yielded to the fact that they were indispensable in the present condition of operatic art. It was he, also, who desired that the opera should open with the tempest."

Signor Arrigo Boito, the composer of "Mefistofele," whose opera "Nero" still awaits completion, is said to be engaged upon another operatic work founded upon the story of "Hero and Leander."

A new opera "Jacopo," by the Maëstro Leonardi, is to be produced next season at the Apollo Theatre of Rome.

Herr Angelo Neumann, the energetic impresario, is preparing—at the instigation, it is said, of the music-publishing firm of Lucca, at Milan—for an operatic tour through Italy when, in addition to Wagnerian music dramas, operas by Mozart and Weber, as well as Beethoven's "Fidelio," will be produced.

Herr Franz Rummel's Concerts of chamber music have continued to attract numerous and appreciative audiences at Berlin during the past month.

The selection from M. Gounod's "Mors et Vita," given at the Conservatoire Concert of the 13th ult., consisted of the following numbers—viz., "Lacrymosa," "Quid sum miser," "Felix culpa," "Judex," "Pie Jesu," and Agnus Dei," and special importance attaches to their production at the leading institution in question, since the work had hitherto only been heard in the French capital at the Trocadéro. M. Arthur Pougin refers to the performance in Le Ménéstrel in the following terms:—"The portions selected by the Conservatoire of M. Gounod's Oratorio have produced a sensation, and their success, more especially that of the "Judex," far surpassed anything witnessed during the Trocadéro performance last year. It should be added, moreover, that Madame Krauss . . . rendered full justice to the music of the master, that excellent artist being ably seconded by Madame Marie Masson, MM. Auguez and Rinaldi. The most pathetic and powerful quartet with a chorus, which constitutes the "Quid sum miser," more particularly afforded Madame Krauss an opportunity for the display of her superb qualities, which also shone at their brightest in the soprano solo "Felix culpa." Amongst the numbers represented in the programme, the inclusion of the "Judex" was a particularly happy choice; the superb instrumental prelude to this nobly inspired piece, the beautiful phrase given to the violins, the effect of which, marvellous enough from the outset, increases tenfold when it comes to support the powerfully written choral ensemble: all this combined to produce a most profound impression upon the audience."

M. Bourgault-Ducoudray, the French composer, has just completed an opera in four acts.

Señor Sarasate will give three Concerts with orchestra at the Salle Erard, at Paris, during the present month.

At the Paris Grand Opéra, 194 performances have taken place during the past season, of which forty-four were devoted to Massenet's "Le Cid," thirty-one to "Faust," twenty-four to "L'Africaine," twenty to "Les Huguenots," fourteen to Reyer's "Sigurd," twelve to "Guillaume Tell," ten to "Robert le Diable," eight to "Rigoletto," eight to "La Favorita," seven to "La Juive," six to Paladilhe's "Patrie," and four to "Der Freischütz."

Auber's "La Sirène," after a lapse of some twenty-five years, was revived last month at the Paris Opéra Comique with complete success, the principal rôles being in the hands of Mdlle. Merguiller and M. Lubert, who were most ably supported by M. Carvalho's excellent company. "La Sirène" was first produced, under the composer's direction, in March, 1844, in Paris.

Under the title of "Souvenirs d'un impresario," a volume is about to be published by the Paris firm of Ollendorff, which cannot fail to be interesting, the author being no other than the celebrated operatic entrepreneur, M. Maurice Strakosch.

It is stated in German papers that Miss Lina Ramann will complete her interesting biography of Liszt during the present year. The first part of the work, which was published some years since, brought the career of the Abbé up to the year 1840, and was written under Liszt's personal direction; there can be no doubt, therefore, that the remaining portion of the biography will be founded upon equally reliable information.

Herr August Göllerich has compiled a complete list (recently published in the Wiener Musikalische Zeitung) of the compositions of the late Franz Liszt, wherein he enumerates no less than 1,122 works as emanating from the pen of the great pianist-composer. Of that number 385 are original compositions, 264 are transcriptions of his own, and 442 transcriptions of works by other composers; the remainder being revised editions of other composers' works. Herr Göllerich, who, it may be added, is one of Liszt's latest pupils, has lately undertaken, in conjunction with Herr August Stradal, the performance on two pianofortes of the entire series (viz., fourteen) of the symphonic poems of his master, in the course of three Concerts given in the Austrian capital. More remarkable still, the extraordinary experiment was entirely successful, the Concerts being well-attended by a highly appreciative audience.

A promising young singer, Fräulein Hedwig Sicca, pupil of Herr Julius Stockhausen, has lately made her début in German concert-rooms, where her sympathetic soprano voice and excellent training have met with universal recognition.

According to a recently published report, the Stuttgart Conservatorium is just now attended by 528 pupils, out of which number 89 are foreigners—viz., 46 English, 39 from the United States, 3 from India, and one from Africa.

A new opera entitled "Das Ellishorn," by Herr Rudolf Raimann, is in course of being mounted at the Munich Hof-Theater.

An excellent performance of Byron's "Manfred," with Robert Schumann's music, was recently given (for the first time here) at the Stuttgart Hof-Theater, under the direction of its able capellmeister, Dr. Klengel.

A theatre constructed upon the model of the Bayreuth Festspielhaus, and capable of accommodating some 3,000 spectators, is just now being built at Buenos Ayres.

M. Saint-Saëns's opera "Henri VIII," will shortly be performed, for the first time in Germany, at the Frankfurt Stadt-Theater.

Dr. Hans von Bülow will give a series of four Beethoven Recitals in the German capital during the early part of the present month.

Richard Wagner's book, entitled "Oper und Drama," has been translated into Italian by Dr. Cesare Pollini.

A correspondent writes to us from Frankfurt-on-Main: "It may be of interest to your readers to hear that an opera, by Herr Anton Urspruch, has been accepted for performance at the Stadt-Theater, the libretto whereof is founded upon Shakespeare's drama 'The Tempest.' The new work, which bears the title of 'Der Sturm,' will be produced during the present season, of which it will be one of the principal novelties."

"Nationalism in Music," having asserted itself with undeniable brilliancy during the last few decades in Russia, has just met with a significant recognition on the part of the Czar. The German Theatre in St. Petersburg, which has received an imperial subvention for the last fifty years, is to be closed; and the grant is to be given to a new theatre, at which Russian opera and ballet are to be performed.

Anton Rubinstein has, it is announced in St. Petersburg papers, resumed the post of director of the Conservatoire of that capital (which he resigned some twenty years since), in the room of M. Davidoff, the late principal of that institution.

A new opera entitled "Os Dorias," by the Portuguese composer, Augusto Machado, has been brought out with conspicuous success at Lisbon. The libretto is founded upon Schiller's drama of "Fiesco."

Georg Unger, the Leipzig tenor, who sang the part of Siegfried at the first performance of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen" in 1876, at Bayreuth, died on the 2nd ult., at Halle, in the fiftieth year of his life. Herr Unger was also favourably known to English audiences, he having been one of the German artists taking part in the memorable Wagner Festival performances held in London some ten years since.

We also notice in our obituary column the deaths of Frederick Lablache, the son of the celebrated operatic singer, and of Auguste Désiré Bernard Wolff, chief partner in the firm of Pleyel, Wolff & Cie., and a professor at the Conservatoire of Paris.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MUSIC IN LONDON.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—A great deal has been said and written during the last few years about the progress of music in this country, but when we look into the facts they are not so encouraging as they may appear to be. I refer now to the poor attendance at many of our best Concerts, and especially at the London Symphony Concerts instituted by Mr. Henschel. The admirable readings of many of the well known classics, as well as of the new compositions which Mr. Henschel and his magnificent band have given us, surely merit the attention of every earnest amateur who is really striving to follow in the higher walks of art. What I refer to is the more noticeable at the present time, as there is now no other regular series of orchestral Concerts going on in London proper. If these Concerts are withdrawn from want of sufficient patronage, a great many people, in common with myself, will begin to think that we are going backwards instead of forwards.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

February 16. FORWARDS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERGAVENNY.—A Concert was given at the Town Hall, on Thursday, the 10th ult., in aid of the Great Western Railway Servants' Widow and Orphan Fund. The Concert was organised by Mr. F. T. Angle, assisted by Mr. Arthur Angle (violin), Mr. J. Pomeroy (violoncello), Mr. Throne Biggs (pianist), and the members of the Abergavenny Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. C. C. Caird. The vocalists were Miss Shipton, Miss A. Llewellyn. Mr. A. D. Jones, Mr. Rowland Addams-Williams, and Mr. E. G. R. Richards. The programme, which included the "Cornelius" March (Mendelssohn), and Suppé's Overture Poet and Peasant was excellently rendered. It is hoped that Mr. Angle will have the pleasure of handing over a handsome sum to the fund after paying expenses.

ABINGDON.—A very successful Concert was given by the Orchestral Society, in the Corn Exchange, on Wednesday, the 16th ult., under the direction of Mr. H. B. Wilsdon. A programme, selected from the works of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Massenet, &c., was played by the band in a very satisfactory manner, conducted by Mr. Wilsdon. The leader was Mr. G. H. Betjemann, who also gave solos by De Beriot, Chopin, and Sarasate, his brilliant performance of which was greeted with enthusiastic applause. The vocalist, Mrs. H. S. Clench, contributed two songs. Mrs. Slade Baker accompanied.

BAKEWELL.—The first Concert of the Choral Society was given in the Town Hall, on Monday, the 7th ult., when Handel's Judas Maccabæus was performed. The principal vocalists were Miss Fusselle, Miss Hadfield, Mr. F. Gilman, and Mr. J. W. Maltby. There was an efficient band, led by Mr. E. King; and Mr. T. Mellor, Organist of the Parish Church, conducted.

BELPER.—The Musical Society gave its first Concert this season, on Thursday, the 3rd ult., in the Public Hall. The work performed was Haydn's Creation. The principal vocalists were Miss Fusselle, Mr. E. Dunkerton, and Mr. F. Gordon. The band (led by Mr. W. S. Woodward) and chorus numbered 120 performers. Mr. A. Mellor presided at the organ, and Mr. J. B. Mellor, of Bakewell, conducted.

BOSTON, MASS.—A performance of Mendelssohn's Athalie was given in the Music Hall, on Thursday, January 27, by the Cecilia Club and the Boston Orchestral Club. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. B. J. Lang (Conductor of the Cecilia), Mr. B. Listemann (Conductor of the Orchestral Club) leading the violins. The solos were excellently sung by Mrs. Whitney, Mrs. Ipsen, and Miss McLain, and the choruses were all most satisfactorily rendered. The lyrics were read by Mr. H. M. Ticknor. The Orchestral Club is in its third season, and numbers about sixty-five players, all amateurs, except the double-bass and a few of the wind instrument performers.

BURNLEY.—The ladies of the Singing Class conducted by Mr. Cruickshank, Mus. Bac., Oxon., gave their annual Concert on January 28, in St. Peter's Schools, before a large audience. Madame Sainton-Dolby's Cantata Florimel formed the first part, the chief solos being well rendered by Mrs. Arthur Towneley-Parker. The other vocalists were Misses Horner, Nuttall, and Thornton, and the Rev. A. B. Edelstone. Miss Partridge contributed a pianoforte solo, and two duets were given by Miss M. Edmondson and Miss Grimshaw. Mr. Cruickshank, presided at the harmonium, and Mr. Fred Myers was the accompanist.——The Vocal Union, conducted by Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank, recommenced rehearsals on the 2nd ult., the first work chosen being Villiers Stanford's new Cantata The Revenge.

CALNE, WILTS.—A Concert was given at the Town Hall, on Tuesday, the 15th ult., by the choir of the Parish Church, assisted by several ladies and gentlemen. The first part of the programme consisted of sacred music, chiefly from the works of Mendelssohn, the solo parts being well rendered by Miss Rich and Mrs. Hitchcock. Gounod's "There is a green hill" was excellently rendered by Miss Wallington. The second part opened with a pianoforte solo by Mr. Pullein, the parish church Organist (Mendelssohn's Third Overture), which was performed in a masterly style. Mr. Joy and Mr. Godfrey also contributed songs with success. The Conductor (Mr. Pullein) deserves the thanks of the public for his successful efforts in putting forward a really first-class programme of music.

CARLISLE.—On the 11th ult., Messrs. B. Scott and Son gave their second annual Concert in the Drill Hall. They were fortunate in securing the services of Mr. Charles Hallé (and his full orchestra of seventy-five performers), and of Mrs. Hutchinson as vocalist. The Concert opened with Overture "Der Freischütz," which was well performed; then followed Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto, Mr. Hallé playing the solo part with great brilliancy; but the feature of the evening was Beethoven's Symphony in C minor (No. 5), which was rendered by the orchestra in a faultless manner. Mr. Hallé contributed two pianoforte solos, and Mrs. Hutchinson's songs were excellently sung. There was a large audience, and the Concert was one of the most successful ever given.

CHELTENHAM.—A Concert was given by the members of Herr August Lortzing's Ladies' Choir, on the 10th ult., when The Eve of the Festa, a Cantata, by Ernest Ford, was performed. Dr. A. E. Dyer played the pianoforte accompaniment, and the solos were sung by members of the choir. In the second part of the programme the Minnesingers gave some part-songs very successfully, and two choruses were well rendered by the Ladies' Choir. Mr. Montague Worlock contributed songs, which were well received, and Dr. Dyer's pianoforte solo, and a part-song for female voices, with accompaniment for guitars, was encored.——The members of the Choral and Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. J. A. Matthews, gave a Jubilee Concert at the Assembly Rooms, on the 15th ult. The great attraction was Sir Arthur Sullivan's Cantata The Golden Legend, which was excellently rendered, and most enthusiastically received. The principal vocalists were Miss Fannie Bristowe, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. James Gawthrop, and Mr. Watkin Mills. Amongst the most effective of the many attractive numbers in the work may be mentioned Ursula's song of thanksgiving, "Virgin who lovest" (charmingly sung by Miss Hope Glenn); the duet in the final scene (rendered to perfection by Miss Bristowe and Mr. Gawthrop); and the beautiful unaccompanied hymn "O gladsome light," finely sung by the choir. The bells cast for the performance of the work at the Leeds Festival were requisitioned for the evening, and played by Mr. A. W. Halbert. Mr. J. A. Matthews has received from General Sir Henry F. Ponsonby, by command of the Queen (to whom a copy of the programme was forwarded), a letter of thanks and recognition. At the conclusion of the last rehearsal at the Assembly Rooms, an offering in the shape of five beautifully designed silver jewels, with a gold lyre in the centre of each, were presented to Mr. Matthews by Mr. H. G. Workman, the energetic steward, on behalf of the donors, for the use of the stewards and Conductor on all public occasions.

COVENTRY.—The members of the Musical Society gave their second Concert, in the Corn Exchange, on the 17th ult. The programme consisted of Cowen's Cantata Sleeping Beauty, and a miscellaneous selection. The principal artists were Mrs. Mason, Mrs. Castings, Mr. Reakes, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Ward. Mr. A. Herbert Brewer was the Conductor and accompanist.

DERRY.—The re-opening of the Cathedral took place on Friday, the 18th ult., the building having been closed for enlargement for the past ten months. The opening ceremony was most impressive, no less than eight Bishops of the Church of Ireland being present, including the Archbishop of Armagh and the Archbishop of Dublin. The sermon in the morning was preached by His Grace the Primate, and in the evening by Dr. Reichel, the Bishop of Meath. The Anthem for the opening service, "O sing unto the Lord," was specially composed for the occasion by Mr. D. C. Jones, the Organist of the Cathedral. There has been erected in the Cathedral, according to specifications prepared by the Organist, a large four manual organ, by Messrs. P. Conacher & Co., of Huddersfield. The instrument contains fifty-six stops, and is blown by an "Otto" gas engine placed in the crypt. It is generally acknowledged that the Cathedral now contains one of the finest organs in Ireland.

DONCASTER.—Messrs. Meacock's Concert, at the Corn Exchange, on the 2nd ult., was a decided success. The principal artists were Madame Valleria, Miss Doyle, Mr. Charles Ellison, and Signor Foli, vocalists; Mr. Tivadar Nachèz (violin), Mr. J. Hollman (violoncello), and Signor Bisaccia (pianoforte). An important feature in the programme was Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor (admirably rendered by the instrumentalists above named), the miscellaneous selection which followed being warmly received by an enthusiastic audience.

DOVER.—The second Concert of the season was given by the members of the Harmonic Society, at the Town Hall, on Thursday evening, the 17th ult., when Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion and Cowen's Cantata Sleeping Beauty, were admirably rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Fusselle, Miss Thomas, Mr. Ralph Dawes, and Mr. Celli. There was an efficient staff of instrumentalists, including members of the Royal Engineers. Mr. J. W. Howells conducted, and Mr. Cecil Gann officiated as leader.

DUBLIN.—The Dublin Popular Concerts have now reached their third season, and it may be added with the most brilliant success. At the first Concert, Mozart's Quartet in E flat, for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, received a very satisfactory rendering by Messrs. Collisson, Lauer, Griffiths, and Rudersdorff. The second Concert was devoted almost entirely to those modern composers who are deeply tinged with a national spirit. Grieg's Sonata in F, for violin and pianoforte, was magnificently played by Mdlle. Anna Lang and Mr. Collisson, both artists being called at the conclusion to receive a perfect ovation. Some of Dvorák's Gipsy Songs were sung by Mr. Walter Bapty with much refinement, and Mdlle. Agnes Jansen, the new Swedish contralto, gave several of her National melodies in very good style. At the third Concert the programme consisted chiefly of Handel's music, the artists being Madame Sinico, Mr. Collisson (pianoforte), and Herr Eckener (violin). The fourth Concert was principally devoted to ballads, the vocalists being Madame Enriquez and Mr. Henry Beaumont; Herr Rudersdorff (violoncello) and Mr. Collisson (pianoforte). The fifth Concert was scarcely up to the usual standard, although Madame de Lido sang well, and Herr Arttim Blüthner gave a good rendering of Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 13. At least four thousand people flocked to the sixth Concert. Miss Mary Davies was, as she always is in ballads, a model of perfection, and Madame Camilla Urso (who created an effect some ten years ago at the Concerts of the Old and New Philharmonic Society, London) was the violinist. Mr. Collisson and Mr. Digby Berkeley were the pianists. The seventh Concert was extremely interesting, an excellent programme being provided, which was well rendered by Madame Urso, Signori Papini and Esposito. At the last Concert of the series Mr. Collisson, the talented Conductor and pianist, took his third annual benefit, and was received with the utmost enthusiasm. The Dublin public owes Mr. Collisson a deep debt of gratitude for his valuable services. He is a Graduate in Music of Trinity College, Dublin, and a Licentiate of Trinity College, London, which distinction he won some two years ago, when he was but nineteen years of age.

Falkirk.—An excellent Concert was given by Herr Houfer, in the Town Hall, on the 9th ult. The Concert-giver's performances on the violin were much appreciated, and he was ably assisted in the instrumental department by Mr. C. Hall Woolnoth (pianoforte) and Mr. James Walton (violoncello). The vocalists were Miss Amy Sherwin and Mr. James Fleming, whose songs were highly successful.

Faversham.—A Concert, under the direction of Mr. Hobday, was given in the Institute, on the 2nd ult., with much success. The artists were Miss Lena Law and Mr. W. Nicholl, vocalists; pianoforte, Miss Ethel Boole; violins, Herr Kummer and Mr. Charles Ould; viola, Herr Heydrick; and violoncello, Mr. A. Brousil. A miscellaneous programme was well rendered.

Furness Vale.—Mr. John Towers, Musical Director of the Manchester Vocal Society, delivered an address entitled "How to Sing," in the Mission Schoolroom, on the 5th ult., which was very favourably received by an enthusiastic audience.

High Wycombe.—The members of the Choral Society gave their second Subscription Concert of the season in the Town Hall, on the 14th ult. The programme included Stainer's St. Mary Magdalen, which was admirably rendered, and a short miscellaneous selection, comprising songs and part-songs by Pearsall, J. C. Bridge, Blumenthal, Sullivan, &c. The principal artists were Miss Katherine James, Mrs. Shepley, Mr. Hagyard, and Mr. Wilfred; Conductor, Mr. J. G. Wrigley, F.C.O., Mus. Bac., Oxon. There was a large and enthusiastic audience. Sir Arthur Sullivan's Oratorio, The Light of the World, is announced for the last Concert in April.

Kettering.—Dr. Stainer's Daughter of Jairus was performed by the members of the Choral Society, on the 7th ult., under the direction of Mr. H. G. Gotch. There was an efficient band of thirty performers, and the solo vocalists were Miss Vinnie Beaumont and Mr. E. Dunkerton. In the second part, besides songs and part music, Mozart's Eighth Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra was performed, with Miss Mary Frances Howard as soloist.

Kew.—The second Concert of the Kew Ladies' Singing Class, under the conductorship of Mr. Harry E. Warner, Organist of the Royal Church, was given on January 25, at the Boat House, in aid of the Organ Fund. The first part consisted of Henry Smart's Cantata for female voices, King René's Daughter. The artists were Miss Alice Parry (Medalist, R.A.M.), Miss Selina Quick (Medalist, R.A.M.), and Miss F. Slater, who were thoroughly satisfactory. The choruses were sung with much taste and precision, that with trio, "Sweet the Angelus is ringing," being deservedly encored. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, and included two compositions by Mr. Warner, the first a Gavotte for orchestra, and the second a Quartet for two violins, cello, and piano, which was well rendered by Miss Jessie Hudson, Mr. H. E. Warner, Mr. Frank Figg, and Miss Scott. Mr. Sydney Beckley contributed two songs, which were encored, and Mr. Harry E. Warner performed Mendelssohn's Capriccio in E minor, and Henselt's Study in F sharp, "Si oiseau j'étais," the latter being redemanded.

Leicester.—The programme of Mr. Harvey Löhr's Chamber Concert, on Tuesday, the 1st ult., was exceedingly interesting, and included the Sonata in F of Beethoven (Op. 17), for horn and pianoforte, excellently played by Mr. Probin and Mr. Löhr, the Larghetto and Rondo from Mozart's third Horn Concerto in E flat, in which Mr. Probin's refined style and pure tone were advantageously displayed, and Handel's Suite in G minor, finely rendered on the pianoforte by Mr. Löhr. Mr. Löhr was assisted by Mr. Whitehouse (violoncello), the two artists uniting their talents with much success in Beethoven's Sonata in A major (Op. 69). Mr. Whitehouse also played a solo, and Miss Ambler won a hearty recall for her charming singing of some well chosen songs.——Hector Berlioz's La Damnation de Faust was given by the Philharmonic Society on the 10th ult., at the Temperance Hall, with marked success. The principal vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Pyatt, and Mr. Santley, who, it is needless to say, were thoroughly satisfactory in the arduous music entrusted to them. The choruses were finely rendered throughout, under the conductorship of Mr. Ellis (who must have worked hard to ensure such a satisfactory result), and the band, led by Mr. Val Nicholson, was everything that could be desired. During an interval in one of the rehearsals of the work, a beautiful silver-mounted ivory bâton was presented to Mr. Ellis, the honorary Conductor, by the tenors and basses of the Society, in recognition of the time and attention he had devoted to them during the preparation of Faust. The presentation was made by Mr. J. Herbert Marshall, and gracefully acknowledged by the recipient.

Londonderry.—The members of St. Columb's Choral Union gave their first Concert of the season, in the Union Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 8th ult., when Barnett's The Building of the Ship was performed. The solo parts were sustained by Miss Mary Russell and Miss Alex Elsner, of Dublin, and Messrs. J. Cattley and J. Hemingway, of the Cathedral choir. The choir, under the conductorship of Mr. D. C. Jones, F.C.O., sang extremely well, all the leads being taken up with remarkable precision. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, the item which evoked the most enthusiasm being Gluck's "Che faro," which was admirably sung by Miss Elsner.

Luton.—An Organ Recital was given at Christ Church, on the 9th ult., by Mr. A. J. Lambert, Organist of the Church. The programme included March (Zimmermann), Study (Chipp), Minuet and Trio (Mozart), Andante (Grison), and March from Naaman (Costa); Mr. J. Heald sang "Deeper and deeper still" and "Waft her, angels" (Handel), and "Be thou faithful" (Mendelssohn). The Recital gave great satisfaction.

Maidenhead.—The Philharmonic Society gave its second Concert of the season in the Town Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 15th ult., before a large audience. The chief item in the programme was a selection from St. Paul. The principal artists were Miss Katherine James, Mr. Hagyard, and Mr. Shepley. The second part of the Concert included two movements from Beethoven's Symphony in D—Larghetto and Finale—Boccherini's Minuet, &c. The Concert was most successful. Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus. Bac., Oxon., conducted.

Malvern.—Mr. W. Elzy gave two benefit Concerts at the Assembly Rooms, on the 10th ult., before large audiences. The vocalists were Mrs. Mason, Miss Helen Dew, and Mr. Sims Reeves; Signor E. Rubini (solo pianist), Messrs. Hartung and Eisen (violins), Daeblitz (viola), Hofmayr (cello), Larkin (contra-basso), and Mr. H. Nicholson (flautist). At the evening Popular Concert, Mr. Bickley's Birmingham Glee Union also assisted.

Manchester.—The members of the Vocal Society, under the direction of Mr. John Towers, gave a Popular Concert on Saturday evening, the 12th ult., in the Hulme Town Hall, which was well filled. The artists were Miss Baron, Miss Eveleen Byran, Miss Marie Melvern, Miss Christine Smellie; Messrs. Byron Dewhurst, W. T. Naworth, Arthur Hewitt, J. W. Lee, C. Orton, and N. Whittaker. Pianoforte solos were contributed by Miss Clara Hughes, and a varied selection of part-songs, motetts, choruses, &c., by the choir of forty voices. The accompaniments were efficiently played by Mr. J. E. Davies, pupil of Mr. Towers.

Middlesborough.—The Amateur Vocal Society held its second Subscription Concert in the Temperance Hall, on the 16th ult., before a large audience. The first part of the programme was devoted to an excellent rendering of Cowen's Cantata The Rose Maiden, the solos in which were sung by Miss Fanny Moody, Miss Isabel Conny, Mrs. Whatford, Mr. T. H. Armstrong, and Mr. W. Riley, Mrs. R. H. Chilton presiding at the pianoforte. In the second part, which was miscellaneous, Miss Moody was highly successful in all her songs. The Conductress was Mrs. Whatford.

Mirfield.—The members of the Battyeford Amateur Musical Society gave a Concert, in the Town Hall, on Thursday evening, the 17th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of C. H. Lloyd's Andromeda. The rendering of the work was on the whole satisfactory. The principals were Madame Emilie Clarke, Miss Richardson, Mr. S. Thornborough, and Mr. Dan Billington. The choir did their part well, and showed that the training of the Conductor, Mr. J. H. Rooks, of Bradford, had been appreciated, and that master and chorus were in perfect touch. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection of songs and music.

Mold, North Wales.—The Messiah was given by the Choral Society before a good audience on the 14th ult., under the direction of Mr. F. M. Watkins, Organist of St. Asaph's Cathedral. The solos were ably rendered by Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Miss Griffiths, Mr. Levison Myatt, and Mr. Bingley Shaw. "I know that my Redeemer," by Miss Beaumont, and "Why do the nations," by Mr. Shaw, were splendidly sung and received well-merited encores. The choruses were given with good effect.

Montreal.—Sir Sterndale Bennett's Sacred Cantata, The Woman of Samaria, was given for the first time in Canada, under the directorship of Mr. Charles A. E. Harriss, on the 15th ult. It is surprising that amongst the many Choral Societies in the Dominion, this well-known work should have been so long passed over, and its performance, therefore, reflects much credit upon the Point St. Charles Choral Union, which is a new organisation, consisting for the most part of working hands from the Grand Trunk Terminus. The Cantata was rendered in a highly satisfactory manner, with a chorus of 100 voices, soloists, and orchestra, and before a very large audience.

Netherton.—On Monday, the 7th ult., the members of Mr. T. Ashton's singing class gave a capital rendering of the Creation, in St. John's Chapel, with band and organ accompaniment. The principal vocalists were Miss Fraser Brunner, Mr. H. Mobberley, and Mr. Udall. Mr. Ashton conducted, Mr. J. Hale led the band, and Mr. J. Harris (Organist of Hagley Church), officiated at the organ.

Northfleet.—The members of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association gave their twenty-third Concert, on Tuesday, the 8th ult., at the Factory Hall. The vocalists were Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. Frederic King, all of whom elicited the warmest applause. Mr. Carrodus, announced as the solo violinist, was unable to be present on account of indisposition; but Herr Poznanski took his place, and, by his brilliant and artistic playing, fairly aroused the enthusiasm of the audience. The members sang a selection of four-part songs, with a style and finish that reflected much credit upon the Conductor, Mr. Charles R. Green, the singing of the Jubilee Ode "Victoria," by Wm. Carter, being most enthusiastically received. Mr. Howard Moss, besides playing a pianoforte solo, by Scharwenka, accompanied throughout the evening in a most efficient manner.

Norwich.—The members of the Musical Union gave their first Concert of the present season, on the 17th ult., in St. Andrew's Hall. The principal items in the programme were Mozart's First Mass, in which Miss Luckett, Miss Alden, Mr. H. J. Brookes, and Mr. W. N. Smith sustained the solo parts, and Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm for solo and chorus, the solo being admirably sung by Miss Alden. The instrumental part was well played by a small string band, under the leadership of Mr. F. W. B. Noverre. One of the most enjoyable features of the evening was a Trio, by Dr. Bunnett, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, well rendered by the composer, Mr. Noverre, and Mr. Price. Mr. Lain presided at the organ, and Dr. Bunnett conducted. At the last rehearsal of the Society, prior to the Concert noticed above, Mr. Goldsmith, in the name of the members, presented the Conductor with a silver-mounted ivory bâton, as a mark of the esteem in which he was held, and as an acknowledgment of the trouble taken by him in training the choir. After Dr. Bunnett had thanked the members for their elegant gift, and expressed the hope that the future of the Musical Union would be even brighter than the past, the hon. secretary (Mr. S. N. Berry) and the Organist (Mr. W. Lain) were severally testimonialised, the former being presented with a gold signet ring and the latter receiving a handsome diamond scarf pin. All these gentlemen have worked hard for the Society, and it must be very gratifying to them to find their services so much appreciated.

Pudsey.—The Committee of the Sunday School Union recently offered three prizes of £2, £1, and 5s., for psalm tune and chorus, suitable for Whitsuntide outdoor singing, the competition being open to the United Kingdom. Twenty-one compositions were sent in, the judge being Mr. S. Wilson, A.C., Stanningley, whose decision has given general satisfaction. The following are his awards:—1st prize (tune, "Tayport"), Mr. T. H. Salter, Bradford; 2nd prize (tune "Irton"), Mr. Henry Firth, Strawberry Mount, Romley; 3rd prize (tune "Gordon"), Mr. B. Butterfield, Woodville Place, Hunslet Carr, Leeds.

Rhyl, North Wales.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave their second Concert this season, on the 15th ult., the programme comprising "God, Thou art great," "Hear my Prayer," and a miscellaneous second part. The principal vocalists were Miss Vinnie Beaumont and Mr. Levison Myatt, assisted by Mrs. Walter Davies and Mr. Robert Hughes. Miss Hughes presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. F. C. Watkins, of St. Asaph, conducted.

Ross.—A performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio St. Paul was given on the 15th ult., by the Vocal Union, at the Corn Exchange. In addition to the members of the Society, the able assistance of Miss Julia Jones, Mrs. Charlesworth, Mr. G. Tattersall, Mr. Charlesworth, and Mr. Ineson was obtained, and, under the excellent direction of Mr. L. S. C. Moss, the Hon. Conductor, a highly satisfactory rendering of the work was presented to a large audience. The singing of the choruses was exceedingly good throughout.

Rushden.—Mr. J. E. Smith gave his annual Evening Concert, on the 10th ult., in the New Hall, which was crowded. Mr. Smith was assisted by Miss L. Ferrari and Miss Hipwell, vocalists; Mr. John Cheshire, solo harp; and Mr. G. Clayson, solo flute.

St. Leonards.—On January 27, Mr. W. Goss Custard's Oratorio Choir gave a highly successful rendering of Gaul's Cantata The Holy City, at Christ Church, before a large audience. The solos were excellently sung by Masters Humm, W. Redfern, and E. Watts, Mr. A. W. Chesterfield, and Mr. Thomas Kempton. The most effective choruses were "Let the Heavens rejoice," and "Great and marvellous are Thy works." Mr. Custard, to whom the credit of training the choir is due, conducted, and Master W. H. Custard, who is but fifteen years of age, presided with admirable skill at the organ.

Scunthorpe, Lincolnshire.—The members of the Choral Society gave a Concert, on the 9th ult., which was highly successful. The Wreck of the Hesperus, and other works, were sung very creditably by the choir; Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Mr. Dunkerton, and Mr. Dalby being the solo vocalists. The Rev. F. A. Jervis conducted, and the Rev. W. Insull presided at the pianoforte.

Southsea.—A festival, in connection with the Dedication Service, was given in St. Paul's Church, on January 30. In the morning Gounod's Messe Solennelle (Communion Service) was sung. In the afternoon "Incline Thine ear" (Himmel), "God is a Spirit" (Bennett), "Jerusalem" and "Be thou faithful unto death" (St. Paul), "Pro peccatis" (Rossini), "Hallelujah" (Beethoven), were rendered; and in the evening, "O for the wings of a dove" (Mendelssohn), "Nazareth" (Gounod), and Beethoven's "Hallelujah." The solo vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, Mr. Sylvester, and Mr. Willoughby. Mr. Lovegrove presided at the organ, and Mr. Behr conducted. Mr. Behr's Choral Society sang the choral portions during the day.——Mr. Charles Behr gave an Organ Recital in the Elm Grove (Baptist) Chapel, on the 3rd ult., which was well attended. The programme was selected from the works of the best masters, and every item was excellently rendered. The vocalist was Mr. George Willoughby.

Stalybridge.—An excellent performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah was given, on the 10th ult., by the members of the Harmonic Society, at the Mechanics' Institute. The principal vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Miss Dews, Mr. Mahlon Firth, and Mr. Thomas Kempton, who created a marked effect in the part of the Prophet, the air "It is enough," especially being sung with true artistic expression. The choruses were well rendered. Mr. A. Owen was Conductor, and Mr. S. Hall presided at the harmonium.

Thornton Heath.—The Musical Society gave its second Concert of the thirteenth season at the Public Hall, on Wednesday, the 16th ult. The programme was miscellaneous, and included Mendelssohn's Motett, "Judge me, O God," Schumann's "Gipsy Life," and two new part-songs, composed by Mr. Ernest Kiver, and dedicated to the members of the Society, entitled "An evening love song" and "Vesper Hymn." The solo vocalists were Miss Mary Beare, Mr. Gregory Hast, and Mr. Charles Ackerman, all of whom acquitted themselves admirably. Madame Gregory Hast accompanied with much ability, and also contributed two pianoforte solos, which were re-demanded. The choruses were well sung by a choir of about fifty voices, Mr. Kiver's compositions receiving a well-merited encore. Mr. Kiver conducted with his usual skill and ability.

Timaru, New Zealand.—Handel's Messiah was given in the Presbyterian Church, on December 21 last, with much success. The principal vocalists were Miss Innes, Mrs. Rout, Miss Lack, Signor Morley, and Mr. Ziesler, all of whom were highly efficient. The singing of the choruses reflected the utmost credit upon Mr. Wolf's training, and a good word must also be said for the able manner in which he conducted the Oratorio. The orchestra was thoroughly satisfactory, especially in the Pastoral Symphony.

Toronto.—The production of Dvorák's Cantata The Spectre's Bride, by the Philharmonic Society, on January 25, was a marked success, the Pavilion Music Hall being crowded in every part, and the music being received with the warmest marks of approval. No criticism upon this now well-known work is necessary; but it must be said, to the great credit of Mr. Torrington, that the difficult choral parts were rendered so perfectly as to evidence beyond doubt the care which must have been bestowed upon the rehearsals. An interesting event in connection with the performance was the début of Miss Ada Arthurs, who sang the music of the heroine with charming effect throughout, and made a highly favourable impression upon the audience. The other solo parts were well given by Mr. Whitney Mockridge (tenor) and Mr. George Prehn (bass). In the second part of the Concert, Miss Arthurs displayed her exceptional powers to the utmost advantage in a selection of Italian music, all of which she executed with perfect accuracy, and with an ease which showed the result of the sound training to which she had been subjected during her residence in Italy. The orchestra was led by Mr. Bayley, and Mr. Torrington conducted with his usual skill and intelligence.

Trowbridge.—A musical evening was given at the Wesleyan Chapel, on the 1st ult., which proved a great success. The programme was entirely sustained by Miss Marie Gane, Mr. E. T. Morgan, Mr. W. Jones, and Mr. W. Thomas. Solos, duets, and quartets were given from oratorios by Mendelssohn, Mozart, Spohr, Rossini, &c. Mr. B. New presided at the organ as soloist and accompanist.

Upminster.—A Concert in aid of the new Club and Reading-room, which is to be shortly opened, was given on the 15th ult., under distinguished local patronage. The programme had to be amended in some respects, owing to the unavoidable absence of Mr. Walter Mackway, whose place was taken most efficiently by Mr. St. John Robinson. The first item was an instrumental duet by Miss Palmer and Miss Matthews. The duet "Maying," sung by Mr. Robinson and Miss McKrill with much feeling, elicited great applause, as did also the admirable rendering of Rubinstein's "Venetian boat song" by Miss B. Murray and Miss McKrill. Mr. Lionel Moore (baritone) sang songs in excellent voice and style. Mr. G. Wingrove convulsed his audience with laughter and amusement in his humorous sketch, called "A silver wedding."

Wellington, N.Z.—The first Concert of the eighth season of the Harmonic Club was given on December 20, 1886, under the direction of Mr. Robert Parker. The programme included Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, Gade's Spring's Message, and miscellaneous items; the most important of the latter being Volkmann's Serenade for Strings in F, and Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro Giojoso for pianoforte and orchestra. Bennett's work was given with spirit, and thoroughly enjoyed by the audience, as was also Gade's charming work for chorus. The pianoforte part in Mendelssohn's Serenade was admirably sustained by a lady member of the club, and Volkmann's music was most expressively played by the strings, ably led by Mr. F. M. Wallace, a violinist well known in London, but now on a short visit to New Zealand. Mr. Wallace also gave a masterly performance of Rust's Sonata in D minor. An interesting number in the programme was the chorus, with tenor and soprano solos, of the "Messengers of Peace," from Rienzi, which was conducted by Mr. Rous Marten, who had efficiently conducted the Club Concerts during Mr. Parker's absence in England.——On December 23, a Christmas performance of The Messiah was given in St. John's Presbyterian Church, in aid of a local charity. The chorus numbered about 120 voices. Mr. F. M. Wallace led the orchestra, Mr. Harland presided at the organ, and Mr. R. Parker conducted.

Whitton.—The members of the Choral Society gave their first Concert on the 8th ult., at the Schoolrooms, under the direction of the Society's Conductor, Mr. Stretton Swann. The artists were Miss Morecombe, Miss Sheard, Miss Smith, Mr. Curlerne, and Mr. Barrett. The Part-songs were selected from the compositions of Stevenson, Hatton, Smart, &c. The programme was exceedingly well rendered. Mr. R. L. Swann accompanied throughout in a very able manner.

Worcester.—Mr. Spark brought another series of Concerts to a successful close on the 7th ult., in the Public Hall. The vocalists were Madame Valleria, Miss Ada Doyle, Mr. Ellison, and Signor Foli. The violin playing of Mr. Tivadar Nachèz was a feature of the evening, and Signor Bisaccia presided at the pianoforte with marked ability. There was a large audience.

Worthing.—The annual Concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society was given at the Assembly Rooms, on Thursday evening, the 17th ult., before a large audience. Spohr's Last Judgment was performed as the first part, the second being miscellaneous. The principal vocalists were Miss Ada Beck, Miss Marian Ellis, Mr. W. Nicholl, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, who were supported by a very efficient orchestra and chorus. In the unavoidable absence of Mr. Aylward, Mr. Burnett conducted with marked skill.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. Alfred W. Tomlyn, F.S.Sc. A. Mus., to Girvan Parish Church.—Mr. H. A. Wheeldon, F.C.O., to St. Mark's, Myddleton Square, Clerkenwell.—Mr. Francis Adams, Organist and Choirmaster to Bexley Heath Congregational Church.—Mr. Ernest Harris, to Clent Church.—Mr. Robert Greir, to St. Barnabas', Rotherhithe.—Mr. Frank Major, Organist and Choirmaster to Hendon Parish Church.—Mr. E. Neville Bailey, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Alton, Hants.—Mr. H. Caledfryn Williams, Organist and Choirmaster to the Bedford Congregational Church.—Mr. C. T. Dee, Organist and Choirmaster to All Saints' Parish Church, Wokingham.—Mr. A. Hopkins Allen, to the Parish Church, East Woodhay, Hants.—Mr. W. C. Stevenson, Organist and Choirmaster to Dean Parish Church, Edinburgh.

Choir Appointments.—Mr. William Brand (Alto), to St. Michael and All Angels', Paddington.—Mr. D. Sutton Shepley, Gentleman of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal, St. James's.

CONCONE'S LESSONS

WITH MARKS OF

EXPRESSION & PHRASING

BY

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence each.

50 Lessons for the Medium part of the Voice.

40 Lessons for Contralto.

40 Lessons for Bass or Baritone.

The sterling value and great usefulness of Concone's Lessons have been so long recognised and so generally admitted, that their extensive adoption caused, as a natural consequence, the issue of numerous editions in almost every country where the study of the Art of Singing is cultivated. No edition, however, which has hitherto come under my notice, seems to me as correct, complete, and reliable as it should be.

I have endeavoured to rectify this deficiency by adding in the present edition signs of expression and phrasing, where I considered it expedient to do so, completing, and in some cases altering, the breathing marks, and altogether carefully revising the whole work.

Alberto Randegger.

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY,

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL,

COMPOSER OF THE "HOLY CITY," "RUTH," &c.

SHEFFIELD INDEPENDENT.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed, the work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be congratulated upon another success."

MUSICAL STANDARD.

"In this fresh musical product Mr. Gaul has the advantage of an open field, till very recently closed almost entirely to the Anglican Church composer; so that at the outset his work claims the merit of distinctiveness. The text of Mr. Gaul's work, varied and elaborate in structure, is the compilation of the Rev. J. C. Blissard, author at the same time of the original lyrical portions of the work. The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes,' the literary construction of these being similar in plan throughout, but each preserving its own separate unity and point of narrative or dramatic interest. The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The traitor of the table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Each comprises a prophetic portion (the words selected from those passages of Holy Writ 'foreshadowing' the event), and preceded by a short choral, which is retained unaltered throughout the work; a narrative portion dealing with the especial event, and what may be termed the lyrical epode, a hymn embodying the subjective reflection on the preceding passages, and in which the whole congregation is supposed to take part. The author has executed the compilation and versification with commendable judgment and skill. As regards the composer's share in the work, it must be noted, in the first place, that whilst endeavouring to illustrate in the best manner possible the outward course of the events, the dramatic element, properly so called, has been carefully kept out of the work. Individual characterisation has been avoided by allotting the different solo musical passages without regard to any representative character. This arrangement has no doubt been prompted by judicious reasons, and there is much to be urged in its favour. Mr. Gaul has adopted the arioso style of musical setting for the solo portions of his work. In certain parts, as in the melodious solo 'Blessed are the departed,' the writing approaches the ordinary aria form, but in general the more declamatory style is preserved. There is no imitation of archaic forms in either melodies or harmony, and in the descriptive episodes the composer has not been tempted into theatrical exaggeration in order to secure dramatic effect. The style of the composition, in short, resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City' and other of the composer's works. Among the items which impressed us most favourably was the chorus 'The fining pot is for silver,' the beautiful choral passage 'Watch and pray,' the whole of the choral passages of the Condemnation scene (the original treatment of this scene evades any comparison with this part of the Passion music of other writers); the contralto air 'Oh, hear ye this, all ye people'; the fine chorus 'Consider this,' the culminating point of the scene on Calvary; the trio for soprano, tenor, and bass 'Thou hidest Thy face, O Lord'; the quartet 'Hath God forgotten to be gracious'; the strikingly effective chorus 'God is not a man that He should lie'; the solo before mentioned, 'Blessed are the departed,' with its choral appendage (soli quartet); and last, but not least in merit, the fine setting of Adelaide Procter's lines, 'Why should'st thou fear the beautiful angel Death,' full like the poem of a sweet, subdued, delicious calm. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn-tunes for Mr. Blissard's lyrics; the tunes selected for this occasion were from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition. An overflowing congregation testified to the great interest taken in the service. On Saturday evening the work was repeated, the attendance being almost equally large with that of the previous evening."

BIRMINGHAM DAILY MAIL.

"A second experience simply confirms the remark hazarded on the first representation—viz., that the work is not only the most important Mr. Gaul has yet given to the world of art, but is one that, when familiar, must arrest attention."

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.

NOW READY.

THE VICTORIAN AGE

FOR THE

JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN.

F. E. WEATHERLY

MUSIC BY

J. L. ROECKEL.

ARGUMENT.

The Cantata is an attempt to sketch for musical treatment the prominent features of the fifty years of Her Majesty's beneficent reign. Those features appear to be the spread of Education, religious and secular; the repeated extension of the Franchise; the abnormal growth of Trade and Luxury, with the usual consequents of Depression and Dishonesty in work; the useful lessons of War; the development of the Colonies, and, in more recent times, the cry for Federation.

CONTENTS.

INTRODUCTION.
1. RECIT. (BAR.) AND CHORUS ... "The burden of the Isles," and "All dark and drear."
2. AIR (CONTRALTO) AND CHORUS "An angel passed from heaven," and "O blessed voice."
3. RECIT. AND AIR (SOP.) AND CHO. "The echoes thrilled," and "Be free! it rang."
4. CHORUS ... ... "Fell ye the lofty pine and oak."
5. RECIT. (BAR.) AND CHORUS ... "Watchman, what of the day?" and "Why toil and strive."
6. RECIT. AND AIR (BAR.) WITH CHO. "Hark! hark!" and "Carry it, thunder of cannon."
7. AIR (CONTRALTO) ... ... "Peace, peace."
8. CHORUS WITH SOLO (SOPRANO)... "And what shall be our song?" and "And thou must lead."
9. DUET (S.C.) ... ... "What ships are these?"
10. CHORUS (T.T.B.B.) ... ... "Ave, Imperatrix."
11. ... ... "Processional march."
12. FINALE ... ... "Then, Britain, rise."

Staff Notation, Score, 2s. 6d. Tonic Sol-fa, Vocal Score, 9d.

ANTHEM

FOR THE

JUBILEE OF HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

COMPOSED BY

J. STAINER.

Price Three-halfpence; Tonic Sol-fa, Three-halfpence.
London: NOVELLO, EWER and Co.

Specially dedicated to our Queen.

THE SOVEREIGN OF FIFTY YEARS. Descriptive Jubilee Cantata, illustrating the Accession, Coronation, Marriage, Exhibition of 1851, Prince Consort's death, Prince of Wales, and the Jubilee. 4s. 6d., with splendid Portrait of the Queen for framing. Address, Dr. Fowle, Eastbourne, Sussex.

A Lancashire musician (taking fifty copies) writes: "A beautiful and effective work for ordinary choral classes, and should not be overlooked by those mastering elaborate works." Mus. Doc. writes: "Much of it could hardly be better—in its way—whoever the composer might be." Conductor: "Choral classes will revel in it." Specimen copy to Conductors of classes, 2s., post-free, from above address.

JUST PUBLISHED.

This work is clearly printed (with an independent stave for the pedals throughout) upon 251 full music-size pages of the usual organ oblong form, and in one edition only, viz., the three separate parts.

The subscription is for either part, or for all, as follows:—

Part I.	10s. 6d. net, post-free.
Part II.	5s. 3d. ,, ,,
Part III.	7s. 6d. ,, ,,
Or the Complete Work	21s. 0d. ,, ,,

When the subscription list is closed, the work will only be obtainable from the publishers at the full marked net price.

The majority of the pieces are of rather an easy nature, intricate combinations of the manual and pedal parts being carefully avoided, and, in order to facilitate playing, fingering and pedal-marks are plentifully given.

This makes the thirty-six Short and Easy Voluntaries particularly useful to young students, and for teaching purposes, as the master is spared considerable trouble in making guiding-marks for a pupil, and the latter will be less likely to go astray when practising alone.

It is hoped that the Twenty-two Marches will supply an acknowledged want of a set of concluding Voluntaries for Divine Service that will not make unreasonable demands upon the player, and yet at the same time will be fairly solid and effective.

The whole work is mostly set for organs of two manuals; for, though the third manual is not forgotten, it is borne in mind that most instruments in this country have two manuals only, and that, while pieces written for two manuals can always be played upon one having three, those written for three cannot so easily be played upon two, for which, indeed, they require adaptation and re-arrangement, thus giving an organist something else to manage in addition to the execution of the piece.

It is generally acknowledged that close printing makes the reading of music a more difficult task than when it is more clearly spread out. By allowing the music ample space upon the plates this is obviated in the present work.

The first four Lists of Subscribers were published in The Musical Times for October last and following months, and the sixth List will be issued shortly. Subscriptions should be sent at once (quoting church appointment, if any) to the Composer, BURLINGTON VILLA, UNDERHILL ROAD, LORDSHIP LANE, S.E., as the List is now closing.

FOURTH EDITION.

THE SHIPWRECK

BIRMINGHAM PRIZE GLEE

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

MORNING.

'Tis morn, and the gallant bark bounds free,
In the joyous gale o'er a sunlit sea:
And the waves, as they merrily waft her along,
Welcome her onward with dance and song.
But a black cloud looms from the western sky,
And tells as it scuds of a tempest nigh,
And the sea-eagle screams as he flaps in the shrouds,
Like a warning voice from the bursting clouds.

THE STORM.

It comes! the storm! the shrieking, shattering storm,
With the thunder's crash and the lightning's flash,
'Mid the yawning skies and the wild waves' dash!
See yonder, that form—'tis the fiend of the storm!
How he whirls the good ship in the might of his wrath,
To the gulf where the foam surges white in his path!
And a wild cry rings thro' the tempest shrill,
As she sinks in the billows, and all is still.

EVENING.

'Tis eve on the waters:—an ocean of light
Bares its breast to the moon, rising gentle and bright;
And the stars, as they beam on the silvery main,
On the calm of its depths are all mirror'd again.
Ah, list! o'er the deep doth a melody sweep,
Now the storm fiend hath flown, and the waves are asleep;
Ah, list! o'er the grave of the true and the brave!
'Tis the mermaiden singing her dirge on the wave.

Price Fourpence.

The gratuitous loan of Band Parts can be had from the Composer, as also an arrangement of the Orchestral Parts as Pianoforte Duet, for use when a Band is not available.

IMPORTANT TO ALL TEACHERS OF SINGING!!

THE SIMPLEST and EASIEST METHOD of Learning to SING AT SIGHT from the STAFF is the LETTER-NOTE SYSTEM.

Select List of Publications:—

ELEMENTARY SINGING MASTER, a complete course of Instruction on the Method. 80 pp., Cloth, 1s. 6d.; paper, 1s.

ELEMENTARY SINGING SCHOOL; being the Songs and Exercises of the above Work published separately for the use of Pupils. In two parts, price 3d. each, in wrapper. In this Work the letters are gradually withdrawn, training the Pupils to dispense with their aid.

THE INTERMEDIATE SIGHT-SINGER, and the ADVANCED SIGHT-SINGER, complete and systematic works of intermediate instruction. The music is in four-part harmony and short score, forming an accompaniment if required, but is so arranged that it can be sung in two parts by omitting tenor and bass. This arrangement in itself is of great advantage, as it adapts the works for Schools as well as Choral Societies and Evening Classes. In two parts of 16 pp., price 3d. each, in wrapper.

FOR GOVERNMENT, NATIONAL, AND BOARD SCHOOLS. The Letter-Note Method has obtained Government recognition, and Letter-Note pupils are entitled to have the Sol-fa initials appended to the sight-singing test supplied by the School Inspector.

THE CODE SINGER, for the use of the different divisions in singing under the New Code.—1st and 2nd divisions, 3d. each, or in penny numbers; 3rd and 4th divisions, 4d. each, or in penny numbers.

WORKS by F. DAVENPORT, Professor of Harmony and Composition at the Royal Academy of Music. Published under the Authority of the Committee of the Royal Academy of Music.

ELEMENTS OF MUSIC. Crown 8vo, 1s.

"In the space of some fifty pages the reader will find all that is necessary to be known about the pitch of notes, intervals, and scales, rests, time, and abbreviations, and will, we doubt not, also find how much there is of which he was ignorant concerning these subjects, although he had already flattered himself that he had mastered their elements a long time ago."—Saturday Review.

ELEMENTS OF HARMONY AND COUNTERPOINT. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

This work is intended to meet a growing demand for a more concise and simpler exposition of the Day theory. It includes as much of the science of Counterpoint as is necessary for students who enter for the Royal Academy, Local, and other similar examinations.

TWELVE VOCAL DUETS FOR SCHOOL USE

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are our special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The pianoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary pianist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

THE CRUCIFIXION

A MEDITATION

ON THE

Sacred Passion of the Holy Redeemer

The Words selected and written by the

REV. W. J. SPARROW-SIMPSON, M.A.

J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary parish churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, will contain the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

Vocal Score, Complete, One Shilling and Sixpence.
Words only, with Hymn Tunes, Twopence.

BEETHOVEN: THE MAN.*

There is nothing so attractive to men as a great example of their kind. The world hungers for personal details about a hero. What is he like? What are his habits? his preferences? his aversions? So the questions run, and the querists will have an answer, to the great encouragement and profit of imaginative people who professionally undertake to supply it. Let me then endeavour to place before you Beethoven, the man. I will bring him as near to you, as truthfully outlined, and as faithfully coloured as the materials made available by those who knew him allow. Of course I can tell you nothing absolutely new, but it is possible for me to present in a compact and ordered form the information scattered over many volumes.

BEETHOVEN'S PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

A great diplomatist is credited with saying that "language was given us to conceal our thoughts." In Beethoven's case it might almost be declared that the art of the limner was designed to show what a man is not like. Sir George Grove says that "the portraits and busts of Beethoven either idealise him into a sort of Jupiter Olympus, or rob him of all expression." You can verify that remark by a call upon your own recollection. The Olympian Beethoven is familiar to everybody. He generally stands out from the background of a stormy sky, as a wielder of thunderbolts should, he knits his brows and frowns fiercely at the spectator, he strikes an attitude intended to be imposing, and wraps his cloak around him with the studied effect of a sculptor's model. That is one of the Beethovens evolved by artistic imagination, and no more like the real man than the "Napoleon crossing the Alps" of the painter David resembles the young General who rode meekly over the mountains on a led mule. The inane Beethoven is absolutely a libel. You know the shock hair, the gloomy forehead, dull eyes, and coarse mouth of the draughtsmen who, missing the sublime, succeed in achieving the ridiculous. That is not Beethoven either. Two or three more or less faithful likenesses exist, but the best is unsatisfactory. Why? Because the man's face was continually changing its expression, and he could never be made to sit still. Had he lived at a later time, he would have been the despair of photographers, assuming—which is a great deal to assume—that he ever consented to face a camera. Even the instantaneous process would scarcely have caught him, to say nothing about the probability of his smashing negative after negative in the height of supreme disgust. After all, we must go to the word-pictures of those to whom his appearance was familiar. These mainly agree, and it is not difficult, by their help, to conjure up the real man.

Let it be supposed that we are walking in the streets of Vienna any time in the early "twenties." Our attention is attracted by the behaviour of the passers-by. They turn and follow with their eyes a pedestrian who trudges along heedless or oblivious of the notice he receives. "Who is he?" we ask, and the polite Viennese scarcely hides a look of wonder at our ignorance as he answers, "Beethoven." We catch up the master forthwith, and take a mental photograph of his appearance. Five feet five inches in height; shoulders broad; general make sturdy and strong. His complexion is rather red just now, indicating a recent visit to the country, but his town-hue may be described as rather yellow. He wears a mass of unkempt grey hair, that escapes from under the brim of his hat and is blown about by the wind. His head is large; his forehead broad and high. The eyes are black or brown, we hardly know which; their straightforward gaze is abstracted; they see little. The nose is somewhat broad; the mouth not badly formed, though the under-lip protrudes; its expression is firm and decided. The lower jaw is massive, and down the centre, as well as each side, of the chin runs a deep furrow, which gives that part of the face a peculiar appearance. He wears a beard of several days' growth, and on his cheeks and upper lip are marks of razor cuts. Walking, as he does, with hands clapsed behind him, it is necessary for him to lean forward a little. For clothes he has the hat of the period, set straight upon his head; stand-up collar, a necktie carelessly put on, a frock-coat buttoned only round the waist, baggy trousers, and low shoes tied with a black ribbon. His general appearance is of the kind known as "seedy." As we observe these things a friend approaches him, and the master comes out of his abstraction. He smiles, and immediately the gloomy face is lit up as by a heavenly radiance. It is like the first ray of spring darting upon a wintry landscape. We feel attracted to him at once, believing that the inner nature of the man is reflected in that smile. But at some remark of his friend, he bursts into a peal of loud laughter. What a change! His large head—here I quote his friend, Schindler—seems to grow larger, his face becomes broader, and he might not inaptly be likened to a grinning ape. The laugh subsides as quickly as it arose; the beautiful smile returns, and, when his friend passes on, the face resumes its first expression, and the eyes their far away look.

But we have not yet seen the man in his impressive aspect. As he goes down the street, searching out a theme, mayhap, for one of his immortal compositions, an idea occurs to him. His whole appearance—again Schindler is my authority—undergoes a sudden and striking change. There is an air of inspiration and dignity in his aspect, and his diminutive figure seems to tower to the gigantic proportions of his mind. While his eyes roll and flash brightly, he takes out a book of coarse music paper, jots down the thought, returns the book to his pocket, and resumes his walk, unmindful of the little crowd that has gathered to look on. Such was Beethoven, as his contemporaries have pictured him.

PERSONAL CHARACTERISTICS AND HABITS.

We have just seen Beethoven in a somewhat slovenly walking dress. But after his first year or two in Vienna, he was at all times, and in all places, careless of personal appearance. In the early days he dressed as fashion dictated, and actually wore a double eye-glass and a sword. Beethoven with a sword! He soon gave this up, putting it off as David put off the cumbersome armour provided for him by King Saul. Ever afterwards he dressed to please himself. At home he took this matter very easily indeed. When Czerny first visited the master, he found him wearing some loose hairy stuff that gave him the appearance of Robinson Crusoe; his beard was half-an-inch long, his hair stood up in a thick shock, and his ears were filled with cotton wool, which had been steeped in some yellow liquid. Altogether he was not a pretty object to look at. His appearance, moreover, scarcely suggested cleanliness. Yet he had a passion for the outward application of water, and, absorbed in some musical thoughts, would go on plashing it about till it stood in pools on the floor, soaked through to the ceiling beneath, and led to quarrels with his landlord. Such forgetfulness of surrounding circumstances was an exceedingly characteristic trait. His friend, Count Browne, once presented him with a horse, and Beethoven actually bestrode it a few times—that must have been a sight! But he soon became oblivious of the animal, and so remained till a very long bill for corn and hay came in. Meanwhile a servant had been letting out the steed for his own profit.

On another occasion he took a lodging in the country, and hired a four-horse waggon to convey his goods from town. We are told that there was very little furniture, but a good deal of music. The procession set out, the master marching in front of the horses, and all went well till rural sights and sounds, of which he was passionately fond, began to work their spell. Then Beethoven wandered off into the fields and the waggon went on without him. It was dusk when he entered the chosen village, and there he found his goods shot down in the market place to the admiration of the natives. The waggoner, tired of waiting for his eccentric employer, had left them and gone back to Vienna.

Always proud and irritable, Beethoven became positively bearish as his deafness, and his morbid sense of it, increased. A thousand stories are told of his ungovernable outbursts of short-lived temper, for at heart, as I shall presently show, he was amiable and affectionate. His passionate fits and strange caprices made him terrible as a guest. On one occasion he ran away from a country house because his host was too polite. He could not bear to be asked every morning if he was quite well. Neither could he endure being pressed to play in society, though he would sometimes sit down to the pianoforte uninvited. His host once threatened, in a sportive manner, to shut him up in the house if he were not more agreeable. On this Beethoven rushed off to the nearest town, three miles away, hired a carriage, posted back to Vienna, went home, seized a bust of the gentleman who had offended him, and dashed it to pieces. In another house, because a young nobleman persisted in talking while he was playing, he rose and exclaimed, "I play no longer for such hogs." At a rehearsal, the third bassoon's absence greatly irritated him. Seeing this, his good friend, Prince Lobkowitz, sought to treat the matter as a joke, which only angered Beethoven more. On leaving the rehearsal, and passing the Prince's house, he ran into the courtyard and, with all his might, shouted "Ass of a Lobkowitz." The master's caprices were sometimes extraordinary. When living under the roof of Prince Lichnowsky, his kind host, knowing the temper of the man, ordered the servants to answer Beethoven's bell first on all occasions. This came to the composer's ears, and so annoyed him, that he went out and engaged a servant of his own. So, when Lichnowsky and Schindler exerted themselves strenuously on behalf of a Concert about to be given for the performance of the Choral Symphony, Beethoven suspected them of an ulterior motive, and thus wrote to the Prince: "Falsehoods I despise. Visit me no more. There will be no Concert." To Schindler he wrote, using the offensive third person singular: "Visit me no more till I send for you. No Concert." All these incidents point to a morbid state of sensibility which was equivalent to a disease. The true and better nature quickly asserted itself after every outbreak, and was so good that the master's friends, even those of the highest rank, freely forgave his petulance and rudeness as a misfortune rather than a fault.

Beethoven enjoyed a joke very much, but preferred that one of his friends, rather than himself, should be the object of it. Occasionally his practical humour was not in the best taste. A lady once wrote begging a lock of his hair. He sent her some goat's hair, and the poor woman, knowing no better, prized it highly. Beethoven, too much enjoying the joke to keep silence, talked of it, and presently received an angry letter from the lady's brother. At once he repented, and sent his fair correspondent the keepsake desired, accompanied by a handsome apology. When Himmel improvised on the pianoforte at his request, he exclaimed, after some time, "Well, when are you going to begin in earnest?" Himmel resented the speech at the moment, and did not forget later to pay the master back in his own coin. Asked by Beethoven, in a letter, for the latest Berlin news, Himmel announced the discovery of a lantern for the blind. Away went our simple musician into society with his wonderful piece of information. When the joke dawned upon him he was furious. He never wrote to Himmel again. His letters are full of witticisms, various in kind—puns, nick-names, misspellings, and so on. Nick-names were very liberally bestowed upon his friends and people about him. One was Sir John Falstaff; another the Adjutant; a third—his biographer Schindler—was Samothracian, or, more often "Samothracian Vagabond," sometimes "Samothracian Villain," and, on one occasion, "Moravian Numskull." His brother he styled "Asinano," and his housekeeper was frequently the "old witch" or the "devil." As these little attentions were not reserved for an intimate circle, it may be thought that the great composer possessed a small amount of personal dignity. Yet his personal pride was enormous. Perfectly conscious of his own genius, and of the distance that separated him, in the ranks of nature's aristocracy, from the belaced and bestarred persons with whom he often had to do, he keenly resented any attempt to treat him as an inferior. When a great lady in Vienna gave a soirée and neglected to lay a cover for him among the highest of the Austrian nobility, he made some remarks more forcible than elegant and left the house. This was noted, and atoned for by a Royal Prince, who, giving a return entertainment, put the great lady in the place of honour on one side and the great composer on the other. So, when he received his brother's card, bearing the title "land-owner," he wrote on the back "Ludwig van Beethoven, Brain-owner," and sent the piece of pasteboard contemptuously to its original possessor.

It was, no doubt, this sensitiveness to his own personal distinction which helped to make him a kind of social rebel. He brooded over what he took to be the injustice of circumstances, and defied as well as despised the world which permitted it. He was once heard to say, "Let them write what stuff they please about me, and call me all the hard names they will—they can no more extinguish the light of my genius than I can darken the moon."

BEETHOVEN AT HOME.

Let us now take the roof off Beethoven's house, and look in upon him there. A home he can scarcely be said to have had. He never stayed long enough in one place to create a home out of lodgings. He was a lodger all his life, and a very troublesome one, quite apart from his propensity to throw water about and stain the ceilings. Something was always going wrong, and Beethoven was always going away, to the great damage of his furniture, and the utter confusion of his manuscripts. He rather prided himself upon a love of order, but his rooms were a perennial litter. One who knew him well says, "Books and music were scattered in all directions; here was the residue of a cold luncheon; there were bottles, some full, some half emptied; on the desk was the hasty sketch of a new quartet; in another corner the remains of breakfast; on the pianoforte the scribbled hints of a noble Symphony; hard by, a proof sheet waiting to be returned; letters spread all over the floor; between the windows a goodly Stracchino cheese," and so on. Amid this disorder things were often lost, and after vainly searching for them, the master would storm about the room, and say that the world was against him.

As a rule, Beethoven rose early, but sometimes he would indulge himself with an extra hour or two. Moscheles once found him in bed, neither ill nor grumpy, but in the highest of high spirits. Getting out of bed, he went to the window to examine a manuscript his friend had brought, and, at sight of the night-capped and slightly-clad figure, ribald youths began to gather in the street below. "What are those confounded boys laughing at?" roared Beethoven. Moscheles pointed to his figure. "Ah, yes!" said the composer, and put on a dressing gown. He often attracted attention by shaving at the window in full view of passers-by, and could never see that he was to blame for the consequent hilarity. After breakfast the whole of the morning was spent in mechanical work, or transcribing, and then he would sit down to his early dinner. That moment was often an exciting one. One of his favourite dishes was a kind of bread soup, which he himself made at the table, using, among other ingredients, ten eggs. These he would carefully test to ascertain their freshness, roaring loudly for the cook if any proved stale. The cook, knowing her master's peculiar habits, would peep cautiously round the door, and dodge, as best she could, the offending ova hurled, along with loud reproaches, at her head. Beethoven's habits at the table were otherwise not nice. He made disagreeable noises when eating, and broke in many kindred ways the rules of propriety. Dinner over the master invariably took a walk. Weather was nothing to him. In thunder, lightning, or in rain, out he would go, often walking all round the fortifications of Vienna, too deep in thought to notice anything or anybody. Then he would return home, and begin the serious work of developing and arranging his ideas, tramping about the room, roaring scraps of melody at the top of his voice, and upsetting the furniture. A more awkward man never lived. His friend Ries tells us that "every movement was devoid of grace. He seldom laid his hand upon anything without breaking it, and several times emptied the contents of the inkstand into the neighbouring piano. No one piece of furniture was safe with him, least of all a costly one; he used either to upset, stain, or destroy it." But the great trouble of this most ill-ordered home lay in the relations between the kitchen and the parlour. These were often strained and frequently the two powers were at open war. At one time Beethoven had two women servants, Baberl and Nany, of whom he thus wrote to a lady friend: "My precious servants were occupied from seven o'clock till ten at night, in trying to heat the stove. The bitter cold caused me a chill and the whole of yesterday I could scarcely move a limb. You are aware that on the same day I discharged Baberl. I cannot endure either of these vile creatures. I wonder if Nany will behave rather better from the departure of her colleague. I doubt it, but in that case I shall send her packing without ceremony. She is too uneducated for a housekeeper, indeed quite a beast; but the other, in spite of her pretty face, is even lower than the beasts." Nany did not improve, and then her master tried his own peculiar remedy. In another letter he said "I have been obliged to endure a great deal from Nany, and I shied half-a-dozen books at her head, by way of a New Year's gift." Upon this Nany improved. The argument of the flying volumes was too much for her, and Beethoven wrote, "Probably they chanced to come into collision with her dull brain, or her bad heart, at all events she now plays the part of a penitent swindler." But Nany persisted in having a white roll for breakfast, which grieved Beethoven exceedingly as an act of unjustifiable extravagance. But the master's chief domestic trouble came to him later in the person of an old woman named Schnaps—a good old creature, on the whole. At first she was called "My fast-sailing frigate, the well-born and worthy Frau Schnaps"; but in course of time the epithets became less complimentary. The fast-sailing frigate would sometimes take a cruise on her own account. She wanted a change. "The creature went off yesterday and has not returned" wrote her master. "The old beast was determined to be off, being like a restless wild animal devoid of purpose or reason. May heaven have pity on me. The new cooking began yesterday." But the new cook was not long to stay, and the frigate returned to her old anchorage. "The maid came indeed," wrote Beethoven, "but is not to remain. In the meantime I have spoken pretty plainly to the old woman, as far as it is possible to speak to such people. But let us say no more of all this bedevilment." Soon after he urges his nephew Carl, "Do all you can to rid me of that old demon," and ends the letter by apparently enumerating the personages forming his household:—"The old witch and Satan and I." These were two not three, for poor old Schnaps was the first and second rolled into one. "Here comes Satan," wrote the composer, "to-day her raging fury and madness have somewhat subsided. During the whole week I was forced to submit and suffer like a saint. Avaunt! such dregs of the people." Again, still addressing Carl, he said: "The old goose is the bearer of this. May the Lord one day deliver me from her." Yet again, he said, "It is impossible to permit this any longer; no soup to-day, no beef, no eggs, and at last broiled meat from the inn. When Holtz was with me lately there was really almost nothing to eat at supper, and such is the woman's bold and insolent behaviour, that I have told her to-day I will not suffer her to remain beyond the end of the month." The end hastened on. "We must have done with this evil old creature. I have scarcely enough to eat, and am forced also to endure the sauciness and insolence of this most malicious old witch, and with such wages too!" At last the end came, and our final glimpse reveals the extraordinary spectacle of a domestic interregnum with a mechanic as makeshift. Writing from Baden, near Vienna, Beethoven said, "I mean to come in to-morrow with the joiner and send off these old hags, they are too bad for anything. Until the other housekeeper arrives, I can make use of the joiner."

"1819, January 31. Given warning to the housekeeper.

"February 15. The kitchenmaid came.

"March 8. The kitchenmaid gave a fortnight's warning

"March 22. The new housekeeper came.

"May 14. The housemaid came. To have six florins a month.

"July 20. Gave warning to the housekeeper.

"1820. April 17. The kitchenmaid came. A bad day.

"May 16. Gave warning to the kitchenmaid.

"May 19. The kitchen-maid left.
"May 30. The woman came.
"July 1. The kitchen-maid arrived.
"July 28. At night the kitchen-maid ran away.
"July 30. The woman came.
"August 28. The woman's month expires.
"September 6. The girl came.
"October 22. The girl left.
"December 12. The kitchen-maid came.
"December 18. Gave warning to the kitchen-maid.
"December 27. The new housemaid came."

What a homily might be written upon the foregoing. But there is no need. You have said to yourselves already: "And this poor creature—this restless, moody, suspicious man—this thrower of eggs and books and chairs at women's heads—this fluent professor of Billingsgate was the mighty Beethoven, the great tone-poet, the gifted immortal whose thoughts were too deep for words."

How poor, how rich, how abject, how august,
How complicate, how wonderful is man!
How passing wonder He who made him such,
Who centred in our make such strange extremes!

As I pointed out in a former article, the airs of the trouvères were exceedingly plain and unpretending, if we judge them by our modern standard. Of them it could not be said that, like many compositions of our own day, "on they dash, torrents less rapid and less rash"; they were not an intellectual gale; but, withal, there is in their placid flow a "concord of sweet sounds" which appears all the more remarkable when we bear in mind that these songs were composed six hundred years ago. Unfortunately, the mediæval notation is so complicated, and, as regards many of the combinations of notes, so contrary to common sense that it is no easy task to give an exact modern transcription of it; and the difficulty is enhanced by the grotesque flourishes with which both the troubadours and the trouvères profusely decked their simple airs. Although these florid turns, runs, and shakes are, in some respects, not unlike those of the ancient chants which the Cathedrals of Southern Europe have retained for their Psalmody, yet their exact effect or modern equivalents are not really known. Hence we may safely assert that, for the purpose of reproducing in a rational modern garb such airs as those of the troubadours and trouvères, the desideratum, nay, the essential requisite, is not to be punctilious in deciphering all the intricacies and niceties of the old notation according to the, after all, more or less problematical rules of transcription laid down by various writers, but to follow the broad lines of a given air, and adapt it to modern requirements, in harmony with the character, spirit, and rhythm of the poem. It is interesting to note how the predilection for flourishes, so characteristic of the songs of both the troubadours and trouvères, has, ever since the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, become deeply rooted not only in the sacred and operatic music of Italy and France, but also in the popular and unwritten music of the whole of Southern Europe. In music, too, the love of the ornamental is distinctly traceable to contact with Eastern nations during the dominion of the Saracens in Spain and the South of France, as well as at the time of the Crusades; and if, on the one hand, it has produced that flowery style by which music is disfigured quite as often as embellished, it has, on the other hand, been powerfully conducive to that high degree of perfection and brilliancy in execution which the Italian and French schools of our own day can still claim as peculiarly their own.

From the brief and necessarily incomplete sketch I have given of the standing and position of the trouvères, and of the main features of their songs, we may draw this important conclusion—that the festivals of the Puy of Arras mark, comparatively speaking, a very advanced state of society and artistic culture. The trouvères of more or less eminence who figure in the various extant MS. collections of songs either as composers or judges, and who must, therefore, have taken an active part in the proceedings of the Puy at the time of its glory, number more than fifty, including no less than ten noble and distinguished members of the fair sex. And when we picture to ourselves the scene in the meeting hall—the royal princes with their consorts; the clergy of the Notre Dame of Arras, with all the pomp and circumstance of the Roman Church; the flower of the Artesian nobility, with their fair ladies; the high functionaries and magistrates; the jury, under the presidency of Jehan Bretel; and a host of brilliant trouvères from near and far ranged round the platform, while the area was thronged by jongleurs, retainers, and the general public, all eagerly watching the contest for the prize; we can well conceive that, mutatis mutandis, the "High Court," or Puy of Arras, in the days of its splendour, might have vied with the scene at a grand Concert of our own day, graced by royalty and the flower of beauty and fashion.

The songs of the trouvères faithfully reflect the advanced state of artistic culture at the time when the Puy of Arras presented the scene pictured above, viz., about the middle of the thirteenth century. Not only do they mark a considerable advance on the lyric poetry of the troubadours, but the neatness and finish of form, and the refinement which pervades them, even though the sentiment be often frivolous, compel our admiration the more when we remember that in the North of France the Renaissance of music and poetry can hardly be said to have begun before the end of the twelfth century. The rapidity with which that Renaissance reached the acme of its splendour, as represented by the Puy of Arras, is the most eloquent proof of how great must have been the ardour of the poet-singers of Northern France, and how intense their spirit of emulation at the time of Thibaut le Chansonnier. And it is because his name is so intimately associated with that great movement that his songs deservedly occupy an honourable place in extant collections such as the Siena MS., which, both from an historical and purely artistic point of view, must ever be regarded as a most precious monument of that wonderful civilisation of the thirteenth century, the golden age of Norman-French lyric poetry.

The songs (music and first verse of text) of the thirteenth century selected, for illustration, from the Siena MS., are the following:—

No. 9. "De ma dame Souvenir."—Thibaut IV., King of Navarre.

No. 18. "J'aim par coustume e par us."—Blondel de Nesle.

No. 25. "Bien doit chanter liement."—Jehan de Grieviler.

No. 29. "J'ai un joli Souvenir."—Perrin d'Angecourt.

No. 42. "J'ai longement pour ma dame chanté."—Cunelier d'Arras.

No. 56. "Tant ai amé tant aim tant amerai."—Robert du Chastel.

No. 59. "A flours d'iver sour la branche."—Guillaume le Vinier.

No. 77. "Amours e boine espérance."—Colart le Boutillier.

No. 78. Jeu-parti. "Cunelier un jugement."—Cunelier and Grieviler.

No. 91. Jeu-parti. "Sire Prieus de Bouloigne."—Prieus et Jehan Bretel.

With the view of rendering these songs in a form intelligible to those who are not familiar with the intricacies of mediæval music, I have reduced the old notation to modern. In doing so I have conformed, in the main, to the rules laid down in an anonymous and highly instructive treatise dating from the thirteenth century, which M. de Coussemaker has reproduced in extenso in his classical "Histoire de l'Harmonie du Moyen Age" (Paris, 1852), under the chapter "Règles sur l'art de déchanter" (p. 274-294). For the semibreves, minims, &c., viz., the a capella notes in which he gives his solutions of the old notation and its "ligature," I have, however, substituted crotchets, quavers, and so forth, respectively, in harmony with the eminently secular, gay-hearted, and graceful character of the songs which assuredly were never sung, nor intended to be sung, in the doleful drawl of funeral chants. I may add that in the Siena MS. the text is written without any division of syllables, words, or lines, and the music, similarly, without any bars, rests, or indication of time or movement. Hence an adequate modern rendering of the songs involves the task not only of deciphering the original text and music, but of determining the key, time, and movement of a given air, and of fitting and adapting the equivalent modern notes and figures to the rhythm, sense, and spirit of the text. THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By Joseph Bennett.

Glinka's last visit to Berlin was of six months' duration. His biographers say that he felt "happy and contented" in the Prussian capital, and he himself bears evidence to the same effect. A letter of this period, addressed to a Doctor Heidenreich in St. Petersburg, is àpropos, and will be read with interest. After some merely formal remarks, the Russian master continues thus:—

"It is probable that I shall make a début as a composer in Berlin. Everybody furthers the idea; Meyerbeer himself urges it. I wish to enter upon that new career with the Polonaise which I composed for the coronation of their Imperial Majesties. You can imagine the circumstances; an excellent orchestra of eighty performers: twelve first violins, twelve seconds, ten violas, seven violoncellos, and as many double-basses. Why should I decline to try my luck?

"Well then, if you love me as of old, be good enough, as soon as possible, to make the following arrangements:—Opposite your house is the music-shop of Vasili Dénotkine. I gave him my Polonaise; and he will not refuse me a copy of the score, especially as I make no business of my works, and, if the Polonaise is a success here, he will reap the profit. I gave the piece to him and to no one else. Be good enough to go and ask him for it. The cost of the copy and of delivery will be defrayed by my sister, L. J. Schestakoff. My address is 6, Marienstrasse.

"Now two words about myself. I am more happy here than I can say. Germany is an excellent institution, good and conscientious. It suits me altogether. Therefore I can, if Allah permit, live here tranquilly. I have fallen into the hands of a miserable homœopath, who calls himself a 'geheimrath.' He has dosed me with triumphant globules of belladonna. Naturally, I have left him and entrusted myself to a doctor of your sort, dear friend—the sort I call cultured allopaths. The least medicine possible, and the greatest amount of exercise—that is the treatment which suits me. Every day I walk several versts. I study much with my master, Dehn."

The foregoing was written on July 26, 1856, and on the following January 27 Glinka penned his last letter, addressing it to his sister:—

"I hasten to tell you two bits of good news. First, you will soon receive . . . a small box of cypress wood incrusted with mother-of-pearl and containing two silk handkerchiefs. Give them to your daughter Olia. Say to her that I remember and love her. She will soon attain her majority, and if I live to see it, she will have in me a good relative.

"The second piece of news is this:—On January 21, the Trio in "Life for the Tsar" was sung at Court. Madame Wagner, who took the part of Petrova, is a capital artist much esteemed by the public. She was in good voice. Meyerbeer conducted. He is an excellent capellmeister from every point of view. To understand the importance of this event, you should know that it was a special concert—a grand gala. Nearly seven hundred persons attended, splendidly attired, and brilliant in gold and diamonds. As far as I know, I am the first Russian composer that ever received such an honour. I send you a letter of Meyerbeer, and some newspaper cuttings relative to this affair."

This was Glinka's last experience of success. Under the conditions of his health he could hardly have lived long, but the end was hastened by a chill received on the night of the Court concert. Heated and excited, he went out from the Palace into the cold air, and was struck in a moment by the hand of death. The poor composer had no resources of strength wherewith to fight disease. His stomach had almost ceased to act, and it is said that for a fortnight he took scarcely any food. Glinka, indeed, was perishing of famine when the chill brought with it a quicker and more merciful release. The death took place on February 5, 1857, at the age of fifty-three, and on the day following, the remains were interred in the presence of the Russian Embassy, Meyerbeer, Beer, Dehn, Kachperoff, a Russian musician, Grünwald the violinist, the hotel-keeper, and two ladies, wives of Russian chaplains. So passed away, too early for his country's art, a man whose possibilities should not be measured by work actually accomplished. Here may fitly be quoted some personal details supplied by the sister to whom reference has already been made:—"The nature of my brother was naïvely infantile, tender, delicate, affectionate. He was a little capricious and something of a spoiled child; he had to be humoured in everything. But, if he did wrong, he took care to make amends. He never forgot a service or a kind action. One cannot say that he led a disorderly life, but he was incapable of managing his affairs, and all household matters were to him insupportable. His failings were intense susceptibility and uncommon wilfulness. He so feared death that he took ridiculous precautions, and protected himself from the least things that appeared harmful. The smallest indisposition frightened him no less than a serious one. He believed in homœopathy, and kept in his house a medicine box. Adopting the theories of Hahneman, he dreaded perfumes and odours—camphor above all, which he regarded as a poison. Spices and aromatics were banished from his food; or, at any rate, he thought so, though the cook sometimes used them in dishes prepared for the family table. One day, Glinka having found in his soup a leaf of laurel, put it on one side remarking, 'I like laurel neither on my head nor in my food.'"

The news of Glinka's death was received with such indifference in St. Petersburg that a few of his friends were stirred to unusual exertions, in order to obtain some sort of recognition of a national loss. Among these the dramatist Koukolnik took an active part. He wrote to the chapel-master of the Kasan cathedral demanding a funeral service "with all the solemnity possible," hinting that, in case of a refusal, he should take other means. The chapel-master, nothing loth, made representations to the minister in whose department the matter lay, and the minister, after the usual time for consideration, sanctioned a service, not in the cathedral, but in a court chapel. It was stated at the same time that "the singers of the Imperial chapel, informed of the death of their comrade, had resolved to take part at his obsequies." This announcement gave umbrage to Glinka's friends, who thought that the dead musician should be honoured for something more than his connection with a choir. Representations were accordingly made to the authorities, and, after negotiation, it was agreed that Glinka should be described as a "remarkable composer." Here surely was the ne plus ultra of an ignorant bureaucracy, unable, as state officialism usually is, to recognise any merit in the highest gifts bestowed upon man.

The funeral service took place in due course, and was followed by a memorial Concert, at which several of the departed composer's works were given. There was a large attendance of the general public, but of the aristocracy only one member troubled to be present. This provoked Koukolnik to a despairing outburst: "Oh! fly far from them! fly from this land where destiny has placed me, and where there are inhabitants but not one citizen. Unhappy compatriots! unhappy country!"

The remains of Glinka were removed from their Berlin resting-place in May, 1857, and deposited in the cemetery connected with the splendid Monastery of the Trinity, on the banks of the Neva. There the tomb of the Russian master may now be seen. It is a pyramid, bearing on one face a medallion portrait, underneath which are the opening bars of the Slavsia chorus from "Life for the Tsar." By-and-bye, these posthumous honours increased, as their manner is. A subscription was started to erect a monument in Smolensk, the capital of Glinka's native province; concerts were given in aid of the scheme; the works of the master were performed; his bust was solemnly crowned on the stage, and so on in the usual post mortem fashion. "One might say," exclaims M. Fouque, "that in that moment the soul of the country awoke, and by the thousand voices of the crowd, saluted one of its most glorious sons. So great creators pursue their way in the midst of indifference, and sometimes of hate; but are the posthumous triumphs awarded them a sufficient reparation for the injustice with which they are treated during life? 'Alas! poor Yorick!' cried Berlioz."

Glinka's devoted sister took good care that he should have a better monument than marble or bronze could furnish. She caused his chief works to be engraved and published, beginning with four overtures, and continuing with the two operas, "Life for the Tsar" and "Russlan and Ludmila." This made public performances possible, and the two lyric dramas were, in course of time, heard beyond the boundaries of Russia. Prague, Milan, Nice, and other cities of secondary rank, know them, but the great capitals of Paris and London yet have to make their acquaintance. There remains to add that Glinka's autobiography was published in 1870. The master brought his life down only to 1854, leaving the remaining three years to be filled in by another hand. Need it be said that the hand which performed that pious task was his sister's?

In considering, by way of Coda to this biographical sketch, the highest claims of Glinka as a creative artist, we cannot do better than translate an eloquent and interesting passage, wherein M. Fouque compares and contrasts the Russian composer with his contemporary, Richard Wagner:—

"On certain sides of his talent, he (Glinka) came near the great German reformer. It is a curious thing that, at the moment when the author of 'Tannhäuser,' dreaming at once to continue Gluck and provoke a Germanic art-resurrection, made his first revolutionary essay, Glinka, shaking off the yoke of Italian tradition, sought to create a national music in the North, at the same time that he renewed the forms and conditions of lyric art. In our analysis of Glinka's two operas have already been seen the attention to character, the bold definition of personages, and the unity of colour which make the Russian composer a Wagnerian 'before letters.' Certain procedures were even invented simultaneously by the two masters: Wagner, with the tenacious will which was half his genius, made into a system that which Glinka practised only in special cases. Let us take, for example, 'Life for the Tsar'; there the rhythms of the Polish dances are not obvious only in the second act; in the third, when the soldiers invade the cottage of the good Sousannine, the same rhythms are heard in the orchestra. In 'Russlan and Ludmila,' the presence of the magician, Tchernomor, is indicated by a descending scale without semitones, destined to picture the personage on the stage each time that he appears.* Note well that Glinka was the first, not only in Russia, but in Europe,* who conceived the idea of these characteristic repetitions, to-day so much used, and that in the two cases cited they are not simple repetitions, but typical melodies analogous to those which Wagner made representative of his characters. This point of contact between two diverse artists who, at the moment, had no bond of union, no common sympathy, is surely unexpected. But on other points Glinka and Wagner are at one. For the Russian musician, as for the German master, dramatic music was intimately connected with the sense of the words. That exact fitness, that striving after an expression rigorously true, was it not the object before all pursued by the author of 'Life for the Tsar?' He who was trained in observance of form, do we not see him, when the dramatic situation demands, renounce all idea of symmetrical order, to follow the movement of the scene, and invent that variety of art, so dear to the poet of the 'Nibelungen'—melodic recitative. We have no idea of seeking to establish between Wagner and Glinka a close and absolute parallel. Not only was the sum of their genius far from being equal, but the two natures and the two temperaments were dissimilar. They were two distinct individualities, two countenances, wherein it would be childish and useless to seek a family resemblance. We have, however, summarily indicated more than one common feature. Is this pure chance? Is it rather that Italian domination over musical Europe had reached its end—that the hour of national revindication had sounded? The fact is clear, indubitable: from 1836 to 1842 a Russian composer proclaimed at St. Petersburg the need to found a new kind of music, and produced two operas in which the character and aspirations of the great Northern nation found eloquent and faithful expression. At the same epoch and almost at the same moment—if there must be a question of priority the advantage rests with Glinka, since 'Tannhäuser,' begun in 1843, was not produced till 1845—the director of the Dresden Chapel Royal wrote the first of that series of works which assumed to end in the creation, absolute and in detail, of a lyric art for Germany. No tie, no previous agreement existed between these two artists, to whom a mysterious destiny assigned the same rôle."

Those of our readers who may be tempted to look into the matter thus discussed will probably find that M. Fouque, with an advocate's zeal, has somewhat overstated his case, but the parallelism set up gives to the figure of Glinka a new interest, and may further an adequate attention to his works.

INSPIRATION.

What is musical inspiration? Whence come the tunes which delight the world, and which no man can compose at will? How do people compose at all, and why are some composers' ideas interesting and others the reverse? Such are a few of the questions which have ever perplexed the minds of those music-lovers who are not creative musicians, and hitherto no one has been found able, or willing, to expound these mysteries. Let me endeavour to reveal, somewhat after the fashion in which Edgar Poe dissected the process of poetic composition, some of the unconscious processes which lead to the production of a piece of music.

In the first place we must be careful how we use the word inspiration. No work of art can be absolutely independent of all that which has preceded it; as in the animal world we see the gradual evolution of complex organisms proceeding from the marine ascidian up to the human form divine, so in art of all kinds there is no single work without a definite pedigree. People's minds are lamentably loose in the way they speak of art-works. They will call "Batti, batti," Mozart's most heavenly inspiration, and apply the same epithet to the C minor Symphony of Beethoven. A picture which a painter has repainted a dozen times, a statue which a sculptor has moulded and scraped at for years, these are all called inspirations when the final result is something unconventionally grand and beautiful. Now whatever be the art in question, the creation of a masterpiece is a matter of logical, often mechanical procedure; but it seems to me that the mental processes are rather more automatic in the case of musical composition than even in poetry. The automatic way in which the brain conducts processes with which it is familiar is a marvel which few people realise. Have you ever considered what really happens when you refrain from a decision and say, "I'll think the matter over"? Ten to one you give no more conscious consideration to the affair, whatever it may be; but when next you call it before you it wears a wonderfully familiar aspect, for one part of your mind has been turning it over and regarding it from every point of view, while the rest of the brain was dealing with the thoughts of the present moment. Who has not slept on a puzzling question and found the solution on waking? When a man has that aptitude for music or mathematics which we call a gift, his brain becomes so accustomed to perform the various mechanical functions incidental to his work, that it moves in its particular groove with phenomenal ease and celerity. In the same way that the fingers of an accomplished pianist dash off a passage at sight which a beginner would find nearly impossible to fumble through, so a musician's mind, on being required to compose, reviews at lightning speed the various data and conditions supplied to it (in the case of a definite species of music being demanded), plunges into the stock of phrases and rhythmical forms which have most struck it during all the years of its education, and which it has unconsciously garnered up, and selecting one or more, proceeds to re-cast them and endue them with fresh interest by means of those devices which it is the business of a musical training to supply. The keener the musician's instinct the more swiftly will his brain select the phrase most suitable to the occasion. Should the shaping process result in failure, that idea is quickly discarded for another; should this allow itself to be moulded into a thing of beauty the musician feels a thrill of admiration, and his whole soul rushes to welcome the birth of this new creation, and to endow it with all necessary adjuncts. Here is where the difference between musicians is seen; some have too much philoprogenitiveness, and deem every idea they conceive good, simply because it is their own. Others conduct these operations in what seems to them like no time at all, so that they have nothing to do but select from a torrent of ideas which flows, they know not how or whence. In their ignorance they call this inspiration, whereas every action of the brain is absolutely mechanical, and the construction of musical themes or lines of verse has to be learned before they can be produced. Did a Red Indian ever write a hexameter, or a Carib invent a waltz? What we call melody is no inspiration sent down from above and breathed into the first empty noddle that comes handy; it is the growth of age, the organic form evolved from the protoplasm of sound. It is the celerity of the brain's action, which deceives the superficial thinker into mistaking for a single lightning flash what is really a complicated series of brain operations performed at a speed acquired by long practice, aided by great natural aptitude. There is no better illustration of the brain's automatic action than that of the pianist's fingers given above. Play a passage of quick notes—say from Chopin's study on black notes, or the No. 23 in A minor. These semiquavers are played at about the rate of 700 a minute. Each note has one of the five fingers placed upon it in very irregular order, there are two hands performing independently, and there are degrees of light and shade as well as varieties of touch to be attended to. Yet a practised pianist can perform such a complicated series of operations by giving one glance of the eye at a written page, and be possibly talking and thinking of something else at the moment. Familiarity with these marvels of the brain's multiplex action accounts for our ignoring them. Yet we are all astonished when a man plays several games of chess at once without seeing the board, a feat by no means so really marvellous as the extemporisation of an organ fugue.

Thus far I have only spoken of the mere inception of a musical idea or melody. The intervals and rhythmic groupings of notes in what we modern Europeans regard as melody are finite and limited in number, far more so than most people imagine. The brain then has not a vague and boundless field of research, so we can understand that it might even be possible to imitate this portion of its labour by machinery. But when we come to true composition, the building of musical ideas into forms, whether of song (homophonic or polyphonic), dance, or extended instrumental piece, we come to a much more complicated action. The same in kind, but infinitely more extensive in scope, the operations of the brain here defy analysis. In early days of study the labours of previous brains are observed, digested (often without proper analysis), and half-unconsciously reproduced with half-unconscious variations. As knowledge and experience ripen the composer gains an ever stronger hold upon the resources of his art—not necessarily all the resources, but such as commend themselves to his individual taste—and writes with increasing ease and certainty. Unfortunately his original stock of raw material usually tends to become exhausted after a time, and he can only eke it out by forcing himself to invent new modes of treatment. The arduous mental labour which goes to the construction of a symphony, say, is very little known, even by composers themselves, for the reason that, once the work accomplished, the mind casts aside the scaffolding and regards only the result. The ease with which Mozart composed the most elaborate pieces is absolutely confounding to an ordinary intelligence; his brain indeed worked with a rapidity which puts electricity to shame. Others, like Beethoven and Brahms, show immense conscious as well as automatic labour, but whether the mind moves quickly or slowly does not affect the mode in which it works, which is thus:—Ever turning over the notes of the scale and building them into phrases, the musician's instinct plucks out such of these phrases as he has been taught by analogy to regard as beautiful. If his sense of beauty be imperfect he cannot produce good ideas. These themes he builds up into music according to the requirements of the moment, and with such innovations as his taste tells him are good and not too far beyond the grasp of inferior intellects. The uninitiated have a vague idea that music is a thing—an elementary body which "wasn't made but just happened," as Huckleberry Finn believed of the stars. It is not only capable of analysis down to its ultimate particles, the twelve notes of the scale, but is a thing built up by amazingly rapid mental processes, the steps of which are ignored by the very brain which takes them, so swift and unconscious are they.

MUSICAL COPYRIGHT.

The reluctance which judges have so often displayed in enforcing the penalties attached to the infringement of that portion of the law of Musical Copyright which relates to the unauthorised performance of a musical composition, and the vehement expressions of sympathy so often provoked in the press on the occasion of the mulcting of the luckless amateur, have at length culminated in a proposal to amend the law as it stands, and, as the preamble of the bill sets forth, to "further protect the public from vexatious proceedings for the recovery of penalties" in such cases. Mr. Addison, Q.C., the member for Ashton-under-Lyne, who, with Messrs. H. H. Howorth, L. Jennings, and Powell, is responsible for the preparing and bringing in of the bill, proposes that in future no owner of the copyright of a musical composition shall have the right to sue for penalties for its unauthorised performance. All actions in future shall lie for such damages (less than 40s.), as the court or judge may deem just, the costs of all such proceedings to be in the discretion of the judge; while a further clause enacts that "the proprietor, tenant, or occupier of any place or places of dramatic entertainment, or other place or places at which any unauthorised representation or performance of any musical composition, whether published before or after the passing of the Act, shall take place, shall not by reason of such representation or performance be liable to any penalty or damages in respect thereof (unless he shall wilfully cause or permit such unauthorised representation or performance)." Finally, it is provided that the Act shall extend only to England and Wales. The gist of this proposal lies in the discretionary power which it gives the courts, a reform which, in the view of the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, will undoubtedly tend to discourage vexatious prosecutions. As to the existence of an abuse there can be no question. It is one of the anomalous outcomes of the law as at present constituted concerning "private property in thought" and the transference thereof. The case was put in a strong, almost an exaggerated, form in a leading article which appeared in the Standard of the 16th ult., and from which we extract the following sentences: "It is well known that there are a few persons who make it their business to speculate in the copyrights of certain popular songs, and realise something more than a fair profit by levying a fine of two guineas upon the luckless persons who happen to sing them at some such entertainment as a tea meeting, where sixpence is paid for admission, and the profits go to a Sunday school or parish crêche. These people are a terror to the organisers of penny readings, and make the life of the curate with a tenor voice and musical proclivities a burden to him. Their vigilance would do credit to the secret police, and from their grasp there is no escape." No doubt there is a good deal of truth in this, but we cannot help thinking that this is just one of those cases where people are led astray by the fallacy of the affirmative instance. The hardships endured by the clerical tenor or the provincial soprano—and we do not deny that there are many such instances—never fail to attract the sympathy of the public; but, on the other hand, the cases where unauthorised performances have escaped the lynx-eyed vigilance of the "traffickers in fees and penalties" or "freebooters"—as we see them described in the Globe—are never taken into account, and they are in all probability just as numerous. We cannot quite go the length of the last-named journal in considering the present system "a legalised imposition of the most intolerable kind, harassing and worrying all persons concerned in popular entertainments, and plundering charities, without benefiting anybody who has the remotest legitimate interest in the matter." For, after all, we should be sorry to think that there were no songs suitable for performance at charity concerts, amateur recreation societies, and the like, save those composed within the last forty-two years, to say nothing of such songs on the cover of which it is expressly stated that they can be sung in public without the payment of any fee. It should be observed, in conclusion, that for practical purposes the new Bill will only have to deal with such musical compositions as were published previous to the date of Lord Folkestone's Act. That Act, it will be remembered, rendered it compulsory, for the recovery of penalties for performance, that it should be notified on the title-page of a composition so protected, that the performing right is reserved. Lord Folkestone's Act was not retrospective, and since its passing such actions as have been brought to recover penalties have arisen, probably without exception, out of the unauthorised performance of compositions printed before it became law. The present bill still further restricts the operations of the Argus-eyed proprietors of performing rights, and in a manner to which no one can take exception. Should it become law, as the Standard points out, "the owner will be able to enforce his rights whenever they are seriously invaded, but the obviously harmless trespasser will escape."

Some objects acquire an interest, wholly out of proportion to their intrinsic value, from their surroundings. There is the familiar instance of the fly in amber, and a cynical observer might be inclined to say the same of such a phenomenon as an article on a musical subject enshrined in the pages of the Edinburgh Review. More than that, we have it on the authority of the Athenæum that the paper in question is from the pen of a cabinet minister, to wit, the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, M.P. Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère? the cynical observer may be inclined to query. For our own part, although not prepared to endorse all the views of the writer, we welcome his article on "The Works of Handel" as a thoughtful and admirably written essay on a theme dear to nine-tenths of English musicians. Of Handel's achievements the writer has the highest possible opinion, at the same time that he does not consider him to have contributed to the onward progress of the art to the same extent that the greatness of his genius might have led us to suppose. "We can assert with confidence that without Haydn we should not have the Mozart we know . . . and that without Beethoven the whole musical history of the nineteenth century would have been utterly different from what it is. No such proposition can be advanced respecting Handel. . . . His works form, as it were, a monument, solitary and colossal, raised at the end of some blind avenue from which the true path of advance has already branched, and which, stately and splendid though it be, is not the vestibule through which art has passed to the discovery and exploration of new forms of beauty." Mr. Balfour goes on to show that Handel evinced no disposition to burst the meshes of that elaborate system of rules by which composers of opera were then fettered, rules which had been devised "not so much to satisfy the requirements of dramatic propriety as to moderate the rivalries of competing singers." But for two circumstances he thinks it more than probable that Handel would have devoted himself to enriching a branch of his art which he nevertheless left very much as he found it—the opera. These were the rivalries and quarrels of the prime donne "which made it impossible profitably to perform operas, and the observance of Lent, which made it possible profitably to perform oratorios." After enumerating the infinite obligations of art to the positive action of the church, he adds "that Handel devoted himself exclusively in his later years to oratorio is due to its negative action. During Lent operas were discontinued, and it was mainly through the accidental advantage thus given to oratorio, in the 'struggle for existence,' that it was able to contend successfully against its more showy rivals." In discussing the pedigree of oratorio Mr. Balfour lays great stress upon the necessity of distinguishing the history of the name from the history of the thing. The early so-called oratorios only differed from operas of the same date in the character of the subject. Both were sung and both were acted. But Handel in emancipating dramatic music from dramatic representation practically created a new "art-form." In dealing with Handel's plagiarisms from himself and others Mr. Balfour adopts a bold and striking line of argument. "If the borrowed fragment shows like the marble capital of a Corinthian column built into the brick-work of a mediæval wall, the theft is a mistake; and mistakes are crimes—indeed, the only crimes recognised in the jurisprudence of art. But if it not only fits harmoniously into the new structure but shows there for the first time its latent capabilities of beauty or of grandeur, then, whatever judgment we may pass on the morality of the plagiarist, the plagiarism, as we conceive, stands justified at the bar of criticism." Furthermore, as regards the question of the morality of the procedure, he points out first of all that Handel's behaviour is impossible to reconcile with conscious guilt, and secondly that so far from Handel having robbed Erba and Urio of their due, he has rather conferred immortality upon them. "The truth is that Handel has not cheated them out of their due meed of fame, he has cheated them into it." There is a good passage on the variety of the emotions which Handel was capable of expressing in his music, though we agree with the writer in the exception which he makes in the case of that especial quality of emotion of which the German word "Sehnsucht" is the best equivalent. As to whether there is such a thing as immortality for a composer, Mr. Balfour refrains from pronouncing a decisive opinion. But it is pretty evident that he shares the view expressed by Mr. Browning in his new book in the lines

> Music's throne
> Seats somebody, whom somebody unseats,
> And whom in turn—by who knows what new feats
> Of strength—shall somebody as sure push down.

The last few sentences of this interesting paper are very well worth quoting: "Let it be granted, for the sake of argument, that Homer is gifted with eternal youth, but let none expect a like destiny for even the greatest amongst musicians. Physical decay slowly despoils us of the masterpieces of painting. Artistic evolution will even more surely despoil us of the masterpieces of music. Let us, then, rejoice that we live in an age to whose ears the sublimest creations of the modern imagination, in the only art which owes nothing to antiquity, have not yet grown flat and unprofitable; . . . that for us 'Israel' and the 'Messiah' are still 'immortal,' because they live in our affections, not because they lie honourably embalmed in the dusty recesses of our museums." The article, though carefully written, is not entirely free from errors. Thus we see it stated that Spohr's "Last Judgment" was produced at Norwich. Mr. Balfour was probably thinking of "Calvary." The "Last Judgment" was produced, in 1826, at the Rhenish Festival at Düsseldorff. And the familiar misspelling Glück might well have been avoided in the pages of the Edinburgh Review.

We often hear of the steady advance of musical knowledge: but those who will take the trouble to penetrate a little beneath the surface will find that this knowledge is frequently extremely superficial. For example, we can ourselves adduce an instance of a man who professed to like music, and yet who could not name one work that Beethoven had composed except the "Pastoral Symphony." Of course the establishment of Choral Societies will do much to dispel this ignorance; but there are still so many persons who look upon music as a mere relaxation from the important business of life, that it will take some time for the masses to become acquainted with the musical treasures around them. We are glad, therefore, to draw attention to the following particulars of the method of passing the time at the monthly Receptions of a Woman's Club at New Orleans, which we sincerely hope may be speedily imitated in this country: "The idea is to devote the evening to the study of some famous man; and the latest was a 'Gounod' evening. One of the members read first a little sketch of his life, and a review of his works. This was followed by a poem addressed to him, and the rest of the evening was filled with interpretation of his music, singing his 'Ave Maria,' and selections from his Oratorios, with a violin and piano rendition of the Ballet music from 'Faust.'" A few evenings of this kind will prove more advantageous to enquiring music-lovers than even an occasional attendance at miscellaneous concerts; for they will learn something of the inner lives of the composers whose works they listen to, as well as the date of their career. It may perhaps be difficult to carry in the memory all that has been said during one of these meetings; but at all events a member of this Society would be scarcely likely to enquire—as a young lady did at a music-class—whether "Bach has written anything lately."

We are often told that the character of a person can be truly judged by his handwriting; and whether this theory be right or wrong, we know that there are many who sufficiently believe in it to consult the professors of the science with a thorough reliance upon their judgment. In proof, however, that there is something more suggestive of individual characteristics in the voice, we are glad to draw attention to a paragraph on "Character Tones" in an American musical journal. In an address delivered before the Rhetorical Society at Bangor Seminary, by Dr. Reuben Thomas, we are informed that there is undoubtedly in every human voice a tone which decisively indicates character. "Personally," says Dr. Thomas, "I am so sensitive to tones and expressions that it adds no little to the pain and misery of life. Everywhere the invisible is breaking into visibility and recognition, and never more sensibly than through these character-tones in the human voice. Understand me; I am not referring to anything that the elocutionist teaches. If he be a man who knows his business he can help you to use to advantage what voice you have; but he cannot create what you have not. My reference is not to anything that can be taught or that can be concealed. Was it Socrates who said to a young man, 'Speak that I may know you?'" The lecturer follows up these remarks by recording his conviction, founded upon actual experience, that the character of all public orators is fully revealed in the voice. Whatever amount of truth there may be in these assertions, we cannot but think it an interesting subject to those who devote themselves to the training of vocalists. It may be, as Dr. Thomas asserts, that even culture cannot conceal the character-tone of the voice; but surely it should not be the office of the master to endeavour to "conceal" the individuality of the pupil. "I will not play to you," said a celebrated pianist to those entrusted to his charge, "for fear you should imitate me." Might not this theory be worthy of consideration by those who teach the vocal art?

When, in November last, the authorities of Norwich Cathedral organised a series of musical services in that building, we cheerfully acknowledged the value of the step they had taken, but felt obliged to indicate certain regulations as adverse to the utmost possible usefulness. We objected to the rule permitting admission by ticket only, obtainable on written application enclosing a stamped and addressed envelope, and we demurred no less to the policy of making a collection at each service. These arrangements obviously tended to exclude the very classes for whose benefit such services are needed. It is now our pleasant duty to state that the Dean and Chapter, prompted by their able Precentor, the Rev. G. W. Barrett, have arranged for a second series on the Gloucester plan. That is to say, performances of sacred music, instrumental and vocal, will take place periodically, in the nave of the Cathedral, admission being free to all, and the expenses being met by a private subscription. The first service is fixed for the 20th inst. We hail this step in the right direction with great pleasure. It is another proof that the seed so timely and thoughtfully sown at Gloucester by the present Master of Trinity is springing up and bearing fruit. Every man who knows and feels the power of music will wish success to the Norwich enterprise, and pray that in every other Cathedral town Dr. Butler's initiative may speedily be followed. By the way, the last of the services at Gloucester, for the present season, took place on Thursday, the 24th ult., with great and gratifying success. On each occasion crowds have flocked to the Cathedral, and there is every reason to feel assured that a strong force, making for righteousness, has been set in action.

An evening contemporary has drawn attention to a fact not generally known—namely, that singing is taught in the Royal Navy by authorised masters—bandsmen, school-teachers, and others properly qualified. We rejoice at this news, because if there be one thing more desirable than another under the conditions of a seaman's life, it is the influence of song. Jack has always been a singer. He loves as much to troll a ditty as to spin a yarn. The common impression is that, in the days of the great French wars, he chorused the sea-songs of Dibdin. Perhaps he did, but most likely he did not. The foc'sle song has always, we fear, been of a pungent description. At length, however, the authorities who keep watch over the life and morals of poor Jack, are trying to improve matters, and make Smith, A.B., competent to take his part in a manner "ship-shape and Bristol fashion." There are plenty of good sea-songs to be had, and a collection that may be described as very good now lies before us. It contains the late J. L. Hatton's setting of W. C. Bennett's "Songs for Sailors," and its numbers are musically as catching as they are poetically excellent. We commend "Songs for Sailors," amongst others, as just the thing for the purpose of the reformed and artistic forecastle.

The proposal to offer Mr. Arthur Chappell a testimonial, in recognition of his admirable management of the "Pops" during twenty-nine years, and a thousand Concerts, is a very natural and proper one. We should say that Mr. Chappell now occupies a position unique in the history of music, since it is very unlikely that any other manager ever produced ten hundred programmes in connection with a single enterprise. The event and the occasion should certainly be marked in a personal manner. We are pleased to see that the Committee is an influential one. Among its members are Lady Folkestone, Lady Sandhurst, Madame Schumann, Madame Norman-Néruda, Messrs. Joachim, Hallé, Piatti, Bartle Frere, Burnand, Alma Tadema, Santley, and Colonel Collins. It appears that the subscription list will remain open till the day of the thousandth Concert, when the presentation will be made. Subscriptions are received by Mrs. Bartle Frere, 46, Bedford Square, and at Mr. Austin's Ticket Office, St. James's Hall.

"THE GOLDEN LEGEND" IN BERLIN.

Berlin, March 26.

To-night the eagerly expected performance of "The Golden Legend" took place in the Royal Opera House in presence of a most brilliant audience. The Crown Prince and Princess were present with many other members of the Royal family, and a host of notabilities in art, literature, and politics. The greatest interest was manifested in the event, as much as forty marks (£2) being given for a seat. If the result did not come up to expectations the blame cannot be laid upon the work, but to the performance, which was very imperfect. Madame Pattini has no qualifications for the part of Elsie, nor was Madame Lammert satisfactory as Ursula. Herr Nicolas Rothmühl as Prince Henry and Herr Franz Krolop as Lucifer were somewhat better, but, taken as a whole, such a team of soloists would not be tolerated in England. The choruses were sung by 350 members of the Stern'scher Gesangverein, who had been prepared for their task by Herr Rudorff, and the orchestra was that of the Philharmonic Society. Notwithstanding the defects alluded to the work was much applauded, and at the close Sir Arthur Sullivan, who had conducted with much care, was recalled several times and heartily cheered, and had several laurel wreaths presented to him.

Since the above telegram reached us we learn that, in consequence of the unsatisfactory character of the performance, Sir Arthur Sullivan telegraphed to Madame Albani, who is in Antwerp, in the hope of securing her co-operation for the repetition. Madame Albani is fortunately able to comply with his wishes, and Sir Arthur will therefore present his work to the next audience in Berlin with the advantage of the original exponent of Elsie. In consequence of this change, the performance, which was to have taken place on Tuesday, the 29th ult., will be postponed until Saturday next, the 2nd inst. It seems a pity that an English cast of vocalists could not have been secured in the first instance, and the risks of an unsatisfactory performance been thus avoided.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Mr. Mapleson opened Covent Garden Theatre on the 12th ult., for a short series of performances, thus anticipating Mr. Lago at the same house. Talk of Italian Opera being dead! why it seems more alive than ever. Here is the veteran Colonel once more at work; when he ceases Mr. Lago will take up the tools, and, after him, Mr. Augustus Harris will try his "'prentice han'." This certainly does not look like the immobility of a corpse.

Mr. Mapleson began badly, in a house only half made ready to receive an audience, with a hackneyed opera ("La Traviata") which had not been rehearsed, and with a substitute tenor who did not know his part. From an artistic point of view the performance was wretched; but it served to introduce a competent soprano in the person of Miss Nordica, an American known to her own people as Lilian Norton. Miss Nordica is qualified by nature for her work, having a good presence, a capital voice, and some measure, though not quite enough, of dramatic feeling. She made a decided impression upon her first audience, and one still better upon her second, before whom she appeared as Gilda in "Rigoletto." Her "Caro nome" took the taste of the house immensely, not without adequate reason. The Jester in "Rigoletto" was played with some effect by Mr. Lherie, formerly a tenor, but now a light baritone, and a clever exponent of the ultra-sentimental French style. Mr. Ravelli—a most useful artist, as nobody knows better than Mr. Mapleson—still further strengthened the cast, and helped to secure a performance that contrasted very favourably with the representation of "La Traviata."

The third evening (the 17th ult.), was devoted to "La Favorita," in which Miss Hastreiter made her début as Leonora. This lady also has just claims to respect and admiration. She possesses a fine mezzo-soprano voice, with an extensive downward range, and uses it to produce legitimate declamatory effects. Miss Hastreiter has, we should say, been more accustomed to very modern opera than to works in which Italian cantilena abounds. Nevertheless, she did well in "O mio Fernando," upon which all her care was lavished. The new-comer makes much of imposing stature and a commanding presence, but perhap it would be well if she thought less of attitudes. Mr. Ravelli played Fernando, and Mr. Lherie was an efficient King. The performance deserved note for being consistently out of tune. Principals and chorus were alike demoralised in this respect; provoked, no doubt, by a bitter east wind which entered the house through many broken windows. Flotow's melodious "Marta" drew a crowded audience on the 19th, and also gave occasion for the appearance of two more débutantes—Miss Marie Engle (another American) and Miss Borghi. Miss Engle, who played the title-character, is obviously a novice on the stage, but she sings well, and makes the utmost of a voice which boasts no great power. She has the advantage, moreover, of a pretty face and good appearance. An opinion as to what may be expected of her can better be given after fuller acquaintance, but of Miss Borghi it may be said at once that she is a tremulous singer, up to her work. The principal male characters were entrusted to Mr. Ravelli and Mr. del Puente, in whose hands they were safe; the tenor doing particularly well, and obtaining much applause. We can speak favourably of the entire performance.

Mr. Mapleson had another new lady ready for the 21st, when he put "Il Trovatore" on the stage. Miss Gutri should not have undertaken so heavy a part. It overweighted her, and towards the end the consequences became serious. We reserve an opinion of this lady until she has a fairer chance, while of Miss Hastreiter (Azucena) it suffices to ask where she obtained her extraordinary ideas of dress and make-up. Mr. Ravelli was Manrico—but this, of course, because Mr. Mapleson did not then seem to possess another tenor. "Lucia" was given on the 22nd, with Miss Fohstrom as the heroine; and on the 24th "Carmen" enabled Madame Minnie Hauk to make a welcome rentrée. Madame Hauk has made the part of the heartless gipsy her very own. She has developed a consistent embodiment full of significance, and made eloquent by the touches of true heart. The audience delighted in renewing acquaintance with this particular "Carmencita," and the entire representation passed off successfully with Miss de Lido as Michaela, Mr. Ravelli as Don Jose, and Mr. del Puente as the Toreador. On the 26th the opera was "Faust."

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

At the fifth Concert, on the 1st ult., Cowen's Cantata "Sleeping Beauty," which had not been heard in London since its successful production at the last Birmingham Festival, occupied the first part of the programme. We have already given so exhaustive a notice of this refined and melodious work that it will suffice to record its warm reception at St. James's Hall, when, thanks to the excellent solo singers engaged, and the earnest work of the choir, its salient points were even more prominently revealed than at the great Festival for which it was written. Certainly never did a composition gain upon us more on a second hearing, the grace, precision, and beauty of tone in all the choral parts, especially, enabling all listeners fully to appreciate the sympathetic writing of Mr. Cowen without the distracting influence of a "first night." Mrs. Hutchinson was charming as the heroine, and Mrs. Patey gave an importance to the music of the Wicked Fay which materially aided the effect of the Cantata. Mr. E. Lloyd created the usual enthusiasm by his fine singing as the Prince, and in the part of the King Mr. Watkin Mills was excellent throughout. The composer, who conducted his work, was overwhelmed with applause, and compelled to re-appear on the platform for renewed congratulations. The second part of the programme was devoted to Beethoven's Choral Symphony, the instrumental portions of which—the band having been enlarged for the occasion—were finely played. From long experience of London performances of the difficult choral part of this work, we unhesitatingly affirm that we have never heard so uniformly good a rendering, and Dr. Mackenzie, who conducted, has every right to be proud of so decided a success. Miss Annie Marriott deserves a word of praise for her solos, as do also Mrs. Patey, Messrs. Lloyd and Mills, who completed the quartet. The band was everything that could be desired, and we were glad indeed to welcome Mr. Carrodus in his old place at the leader's desk.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

An Afternoon Concert was given by the Choral Society, on the 19th ult., when Mr. Barnby produced Rossini's "Messe Solennelle," rousing that work up from a long sleep, and, perhaps, causing reproach in many minds for that it was permitted to slumber so long. The Mass has distinct claims upon attention, although its music is not, generally speaking, that which commends itself to our Northern natures as consistent with the dignity of religious worship. Those who cannot separate the work from its ritual purpose should remember, however, that it was written by an Italian, with Italian tastes and feelings. As for those who can so distinguish, they will not require this matter to be pursued. To them the music is simply music, beautiful and enjoyable. A large company of amateurs attended the performance, and frequently demonstrated the pleasure it gave them. Indeed, the more melodious—that is to say, Rossinian—numbers were very heartily applauded. No wonder, for the provocation to applause was irresistible; owing some of its strength to a rendering of the work that allowed none of its beauties to remain undisplayed. We must especially commend the singing of the choruses, which was excellent in the highest degree, and quite worthy the traditions of a famous choir. Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley delivered the solo passages in a manner that need not be characterised, and the orchestra was up to its usual mark. Dr. Stainer had important work at the organ, and did it well; so with Mr. Barnby at the conductor's desk.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The modest scheme put forward by this Society has been creditably fulfilled, and if no great triumphs have been gained during the season, at any rate no ground has been lost. This being so, perhaps the Council may take heart of grace and next year present a somewhat more varied and ambitious programme. The two final performances which we have now to chronicle consisted of Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" and Costa's "Eli," both works being peculiarly associated with the original Society. It was Sir Michael Costa who arranged his compatriot's "Moïse" for concert performance, and conducted it annually from 1878 to the time when he resigned the bâton. In the direction of Rossini's music, which he so loved, he was without a rival, and it is therefore with much pleasure that we can speak of the rendering under Mr. W. H. Cummings on February 25, as an artistic success. Of course the work presents no executive difficulties either to choir or orchestra, but it needs vigour combined with delicacy for its due effect. Flimsy, flippant, and strangely out of character with the gravity of the subject as much of the music appears to our sober ideas, it must be remembered that it represents a school of composition, and if performed at all should receive as much attention and care as a sacred masterpiece of German or English art. If, on the whole, the soloists were not on the same level as the band and chorus, it is because vocalists at present have but little inducement to perfect themselves in the Rossinian style. Mr. Lloyd was, however, as usual thoroughly at home; this great artist is equally good in every class of music. No one could accuse the Society of parsimony in the selection of the cast. Such names as Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Suter, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Piercy, Mr. Watkin Mills, Mr. Hilton, and Mr. Bridson gave strength to the programme, and the large audience seemed greatly pleased with the performance.

The performance of "Eli," on the 25th ult., was generally better as regards the soloists, but not so commendable with respect to the choir. Indeed, there was an actual breakdown in the chorus of Levites "O ye kindreds of the people," the cause of which was probably a mystery to the majority of the audience, though it was clear enough to those who were following the score. The honours of the evening were carried off by Mrs. Patey and Mr. Santley. Both artists sang magnificently, and the former in the well-known Evening Prayer afforded an example of refined vocalisation impossible to surpass. Miss Pauline Cramer is improving, and will probably become in time an unexceptionable oratorio singer. Mr. McGuckin sang the famous War song with much spirit, and created a great effect. We have been pleased to note the good attendances at the Society's Concerts this season, and trust that the executive will be thereby emboldened to act with a larger amount of spirit and enterprise, tempered, of course, by discretion, in preparing the scheme for next year.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

Mr. Schönberger, who made his first appearance at these Concerts on February 26, reasserted the capacity he has shown elsewhere of alternately delighting and displeasing his audience. His performance in Saint-Saëns's brilliant Concerto (No. 2, in G minor) was nothing short of marvellous for the delicacy, crispness, and incisive vigour which it revealed. On the other hand, his rendering of Chopin's Ballade in A flat was coarse and even inaccurate. Wrong notes were struck and the performance disfigured by a constant abuse of the pedals. Mr. Schönberger was more successful in his selections from Volkmann's "Vizsegrad," but the bewildering inequality of his interpretation seems to indicate a want of artistic sympathy that no amount of technique can compensate for. Mr. Prout's new Symphony (No. 4, in D major) was heard for the first time at the Crystal Palace, and, admirably interpreted under the direction of Mr. Manns, secured a sympathetic welcome. The composer has chosen a smaller canvas than usual, but, to continue the metaphor, he has laid on his colour with even more than his wonted cleanness. Scholarly in construction and charmingly orchestrated, this work, if a little old-world in form, is a model of lucidity happily exemplifying what excellent results can be obtained by the legitimate use of small means. The programme also included Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture, Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale (Op. 52), and songs from Miss Alice Whitacre.

The programme of the Concert of the 5th ult. consisted exclusively of the compositions of Mendelssohn, opening with an admirable performance of the "Reformation" Symphony. Miss Amy Sherwin then gave the familiar air from "St. Paul," "O Jerusalem," and the remainder of the Concert was occupied by the performance of "Athalie." Here the Directors had been so fortunate as to secure the services of Mr. Santley as reader of the connecting and explanatory text. Mr. Santley acquitted himself of this by no means easy task in excellent fashion, making every syllable heard to the farthest corners of the concert-room without any effort or exaggeration. Of the performance of the Crystal Palace choir it is pleasant to be able to speak in terms of high commendation. There was no lack of sonority in the quality of the voices or of certainty in their attack. The orchestra played con amore throughout, but of the efforts of the principal vocalists the less that is said the better. Miss Sherwin—who has on former occasions pleased us by her intelligent and refined singing—was evidently very much out of voice, and Miss Eleanor Rees, much in request as a ballad-singer, proved anything but satisfactory. Doubtless the excellence of the orchestral and choral ensemble threw the shortcomings of the vocalists into stronger relief.

Mr. Manns is not likely to repent the encouragement he has given to English music as represented by the "Serenade in Symphonic Form," by Mr. George J. Bennett, which headed the programme of the 12th ult. Mr. Bennett, we may be allowed to remind our readers, after a very distinguished career at the Royal Academy of Music, has further pursued his studies in Germany for the last three years, and the advantages of this long and thorough training—extending, if we mistake not, over a period of nine years—as opposed to the ill advised haste shown by so many young and promising musicians in curtailing the duration of their preparatory studies, have been most conclusively demonstrated by the merits of the composition heard on this occasion. We can pay no more flattering tribute to its merit than by saying that, though succeeded by such masterpieces as the greatest of all Concertos and Schubert's matchless Unfinished Symphony, the impression created by its unaffected grace, constructive skill, and effective instrumentation remained uneffaced at the close of the Concert. The modesty shown in Mr. Bennett's choice of a name for his work is observable throughout the whole composition itself, which is singularly free from the restless pretentiousness of much modern orchestral music. There is an abundance of melody in all the movements, the flowing themes of the Allegro and the tranquil charm of the Andante contrasting with the daintiness of the Scherzo and the unflagging energy of the Finale, which is the most striking of all the sections—abounding in rhythmic charm and picturesque orchestration. The rhythm adopted in the Scherzo is rightly described as "dangerous" in the analytical programme, from the obvious reminiscence which it suggests of one famous Scherzo; but for our own part we would rather see a young writer follow in the footsteps of Beethoven, Schumann, and Mendelssohn than attempt to outstrip Wagner. Mr. Bennett's work had the advantage of a most sympathetic analysis from the pen of Sir George Grove, and of an interpretation from the Crystal Palace Orchestra that must have satisfied the composer, as it certainly delighted the audience. Bearing a name that is of itself of good omen, and endowed with qualities which are the surest earnest of success, Mr. Bennett has entered upon his professional career under the happiest auspices, and his future efforts will be awaited with the keenest interest.

Miss Agnes Zimmermann besides sustaining the solo part in Beethoven's E flat Concerto (No. 5) in workmanlike fashion, contributed Chopin's Nocturne in D flat and a Capriccio in E flat (Paganini-Liszt), showing especial crispness of touch in the latter piece. The programme also included a masterly rendering of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor—which we observe is described by a contemporary in such terms as to suggest the notion that it was a novelty to the Crystal Palace audience—and two songs from Madame Valleria "O River, dear River" ("Nadeshda"), and "The Vigil" (H. J. Edwards).

Of the programme of the sixteenth of the series, it is not too much to say that the genius of Mozart, represented by the Overture to "Don Giovanni," and the incomparable playing of Mr. Joachim, were the two striking, we had almost said redeeming, features. Max Bruch's Violin Concerto (No. 1, in G minor) is undoubtedly a pleasing work, and improves on acquaintance; and Smetana's "Lustspiel" Overture is bright and merry music. But we confess to being bitterly disappointed with Widor's Symphony, of which such favourable expectations had been aroused. There are undoubtedly some beaux momens in the work, notably a charming second subject in the first movement; there is no lack of constructive skill and originality of mechanical contrivance; and the way in which the principal themes are passed in review at the opening of the Finale is not wanting in humour. But, on the whole, the mauvais quarts d'heure predominate. Mr. Gadsby's orchestral Scene "The Forest of Arden"—composed for the Philharmonic Society, and performed for the first time at their Concerts on March 6, 1886—improves on acquaintance, notably the Intermezzo; the themes of the Allegro, on the other hand, though catching, are wanting in distinction. It is the fashion in these latter days to discover blemishes in Mr. Joachim's playing, but on this occasion he certainly left no loophole of attack to the most captious of critics. Intonation, purity, breadth of tone, and nobility of conception—all were faultless. Beside his share in the Concerto, Mr. Joachim gave Tartini's famous Sonata "Il trillo del Diavolo"—a favourite cheval de bataille of his—and as the audience would not be denied, Schumann's "Abendlied" for an encore. Miss Adelaide Mullen, a young Irish vocalist and a débutante at these Concerts, created a fairly favourable impression by her sympathetic style, but "Hear ye, Israel," proved quite beyond her power or compass, which is that of a limited mezzo-soprano. Miss Mullen was far more at home in Clay's "She wandered down the mountain side," but her advance in popular estimation can only be achieved by the adoption of a better method of producing and controlling her voice.

The hall was well filled on the 26th ult., on which occasion Beethoven's music to "Egmont," and Félicien David's Symphonic Ode, "The Desert," were performed, to the evident delight of the audience. In the former work the orchestra acquitted themselves in a faultless style, special credit attaching to the admirable performance of the oboe in the third entr'acte. The explanatory text and extracts from Goethe's drama were conscientiously recited by Miss Alma Murray, and Clara's two songs rendered with intelligence by Miss Hilda Coward. "The Desert" is a singularly attractive work, full of poetic sentiment and delicate colouring, and none of these qualities suffered in the admirable interpretation which the work received at the hands of orchestra, chorus, and principals. The "Chant of the Muezzin," in which David has idealised the call to prayer—much in the same spirit that Liszt has idealised the improvisations of the gipsies in his Hungarian Rhapsodies—was superbly sung by Mr. Lloyd, as though he were to the manner born; and the two other charming airs for tenor solo were given in perfect style by the same artist. Four pupils of the Royal College, Messrs. Kilby, Houghton, Price, and Ridding, formed an efficient solo quartet, and the tenors and basses of the Crystal Palace choir were thoroughly satisfactory in the male choruses. Two features in the performance of the orchestra call for special comment—the admirable playing of the horn in the air "O lovely night" and the wonderful crescendo in the strings in the instrumental representation of sunrise at the opening of the third part.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

A special interest was given to the first Concert of the season, on the 10th ult., by the engagement of Madame Schumann, who gave a rendering of her late husband's Concerto so absolutely perfect as to leave an impression upon her listeners which will not easily be effaced. It would be difficult indeed to select any portions of her performance for particular mention, her intellectual conception of the entire work, and her marvellous executive powers, holding the audience spell-bound to the conclusion, when the ringing applause from all parts of the room, and a triple recall of the pianist to the platform, must have convinced her how highly her artistic gifts are appreciated by the English public. That she has read us a lesson on the pure and classical form of pianoforte playing is something to be grateful for, especially when we consider that the work selected for the occasion was one which she lovingly reveals to us reflected from the mind of its composer, and that we have a right, therefore, rather to listen than to criticise. Unfortunately, Sir Arthur Sullivan—who has been staying at Monte Carlo during the recent earthquakes—was too unwell to conduct; but the band, under Mr. George Mount, played Brahms's Symphony in E minor and Mendelssohn's Overture to "Ruy Blas" very finely, and concluded the Concert with an excellent performance of the Finale from Moszkowski's Suite in F, composed expressly for the Society, and produced last season. The vocalist was Madame Valleria, who was highly successful in a Scena from Goring Thomas's Opera "Nadeshda," Mendelssohn's "Winterlied," and Schumann's "Widmung."

At the second Concert, on the 24th ult., Sir Arthur Sullivan was again absent, and his place was ably supplied by Mr. F. H. Cowen. An interesting number in the programme was a Quartet-Concertante, said to be by Mozart, but scarcely authenticated, even by internal evidence. It is suggested that the work may be the "Sinfonie-Concertante" for wind and orchestra mentioned by Köchel as having been written in Paris; but if so, the flute part has been taken out, and replaced by one for the clarionet. The movements are graceful; but there is little to inspire any desire for a more intimate knowledge of the composition, and it was received with a warmth of applause due in no inconsiderable degree to the exceptionally fine rendering of the principal parts by Mr. G. H. Lebon (oboe), Mr. G. A. Clinton (clarinet), Mr. T. E. Mann (horn), and Mr. W. B. Wotton (bassoon). Mr. Leopold Auer's performance of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto created an enthusiasm earned rather by his consummate mastery over the technical difficulties of the work than by an intelligent appreciation of its meaning. Some portions were dragged, and others—especially the whole of the last movement—taken at a speed which completely obscured the many beautiful details of the orchestration. At the termination of his performance Mr. Auer was enthusiastically recalled. Little need be said of Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony, as, although it was given for the first time at these Concerts, it has now thoroughly taken its place amongst the best works of our young English composers. Each movement was vigorously applauded, and the composer compelled to bow his acknowledgments. The other orchestral items were the Overtures "Coriolan" (Beethoven) and "Zanetta" (Auber), Miss Nordica contributing two vocal pieces, "Let the bright Seraphim" (Handel)—the trumpet obbligato being well played by Mr. W. Ellis—and the Aria "Gli angui d'inferno" (Mozart), in both of which her clear soprano voice was heard to much advantage.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

As the season advances these entertainments invariably command more and more of public attention, and during the past month St. James's Hall has been filled to overflowing at almost every performance. The first Concert of which we have to take note is that of Saturday, February 26, when a specially attractive programme was provided. There are no more popular works in the repertory than Beethoven's Rasoumowski Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3) and his Serenade Trio in D (Op. 8), and with these was associated one of Schubert's too seldom heard Sonatas—namely, that in A (Op. 120). Thanks are due to Miss Zimmermann for reviving the work, which, though not so lengthy or elaborate as some of its companions, is fully representative of Schubert's genius. The date of its composition appears to be uncertain, but Nottebohm in his catalogue names 1825 as the probable year. An apology was made on behalf of Mr. Orlando Harley on the ground that he was suffering from hoarseness, but it was not needed, as he gave a very tasteful rendering of Mozart's "Il mio tesoro" and two of Schubert's Lieder.

Musicians and the general public were equally cared for in the scheme of the following Monday, the former by a couple of novelties, and the latter by the revival of Mendelssohn's Ottet, which, by some strange chance, had not been heard for over four years. To say a word in praise of this marvellous example of early developed genius is quite unnecessary, and it will be sufficient to record that the Ottet was received with enthusiasm, and its speedy repetition at once decided upon. The first of the novelties was Chopin's Allegro de Concert in A (Op. 46), which was brought forward by Mr. Max Pauer. It is one of the least individual of the composer's larger pieces, which accounts for its general neglect by pianists. At any rate, however, it served to show the rapid progress Mr. Pauer is making as an executant, more particularly in breadth of style. The student is merging into the artist. By a strange coincidence the other work given for the first time proved equally unrepresentative of its composer's genius. We refer to Spohr's Pianoforte Quintet in C minor (Op. 53), which was written in 1820, specially to display Madame Spohr's ability as a pianist. It therefore consists for the most part of brilliant passages for the keyed instrument much in the Hummel style, and of little musical interest. The other parts, originally for flute, clarinet, bassoon, and horn, and afterwards rearranged for strings, are little better than accompaniments. It was the latter arrangement which was performed on the present occasion. Mr. Joachim gave his favourite violin solos adapted from Schumann, and Miss Hope Glenn was successful in airs by Haydn and F. Ries.

At a very early hour on Saturday morning, the 5th ult., the doors of St. James's Hall were blocked by throngs of people, many of whom had brought supplies of bodily sustenance to enable them to bear the many weary hours of waiting. The scene outside, and afterwards inside, recalled the Liszt and Rubinstein fevers last year. On this occasion, however, it was a lady whom the public desired to honour by their presence and admiration—the most illustrious of living female musicians, the widow of Robert Schumann. Though, of course, interest was concentrated on the playing of Madame Schumann, a fine performance of Schubert's Quartet in D minor elicited great applause, and Miss Liza Lehmann was heartily recalled after her charming rendering of an old Italian air "Sta in tono, mio core." Then there was a flutter of expectation, and when the great artist was seen ascending the stairs thunders of applause broke forth from all parts of the room. Madame Schumann's solos were unimportant—only No. 1 of her husband's Sketches for pedal piano (Op. 58), and Nos. 2 and 3 of the Romances (Op. 28)—but they served to reveal once more the exquisite singing tone and perfection of phrasing which for so many years placed her at the head of the classical school of pianoforte playing. The audience would not be satisfied until she reseated herself at the instrument, when she gave No. 4 of the above-named Sketches. Subsequently she joined Mr. Joachim and Mr. Piatti in Beethoven's Trio in B flat (Op. 97), and a finer performance of this, the finest work of its class, has surely never been heard at St. James's Hall or elsewhere.

Scarcely more than formal record is required of the Concert on the following Monday, the programme consisting entirely of familiar works. What could be said that has not been said many times of Beethoven's Quintet in C (Op. 29), or his Piano and Violin Sonata in A (Op. 30, No. 1)! Or of Brahms's Hungarian Dances, as arranged for violin and piano by Mr. Joachim! Or of Bach's Italian Concerto! It is only due to Miss Fanny Davies, however, to compliment her upon her rendering of the last named work. Of course she played the notes correctly, but she also entered into the spirit of the music, making no attempt to modernise Bach, as some pianists do, with the idea, no doubt, of exhibiting their cleverness. Mrs. Henschel, excellent artist as she is, was not at her best in Purcell's delightful air, "Nymphs and Shepherds." She sang it too quickly, thus injuring the antique grace of the melody.

The repetition performance of Mendelssohn's Ottet, referred to above, took place on Saturday, the 12th ult., and the work was again so warmly received that it is not likely to fall out of the repertory for another four years. Another feature of the programme was Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in A (Op. 26), a much finer work than its companion in G minor (Op. 25), though it is not so often performed, and has not been heard at a Monday Concert for more than eight years. Mr. Max Pauer played Beethoven's familiar Andante in F, and the posthumous Rondo in G (Op. 129), which the composer humorously describes as an expression of anger because of a lost groschen; but the piece itself is written in a very light and lively style, as if he were in what he described as his "unbuttoned" mood. Mr. Santley was in splendid voice, and was recalled twice after Sullivan's "Thou'rt passing hence," and four times after Gounod's "Medjé."

Madame Schumann presented herself to the Monday subscribers on the 14th, and again played three of her husband's pieces, namely the "Aufschwung," "Warum," and "Trausmeswirren" from Op. 12. Her rendering of these trifles, which are now almost as popular as Mendelssohn's "Songs without words," doubtless afforded an admirable lesson to hundreds among the audience. Of course there was a demand for more, to which the great artist responded by giving the favourite "Schlummerlied." She afterwards joined Mr. Piatti in Mendelssohn's Sonata in D for piano and violoncello (Op. 58), with what results our readers will readily imagine. Mozart's Quintet in D and Beethoven's Trio in G (Op. 9, No. 1) were included in the programme, and Mr. Orlando Harley won favour in Mozart's "Dalla sua pace" and Mendelssohn's "Spring Song."

The Concert of Saturday, the 19th, may be dismissed with equal brevity. Notwithstanding Rossini's Mass at the Albert Hall and Mr. Joachim at the Crystal Palace, the usual crowd was present, the leading attraction being Madame Schumann in Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata. Schubert's favourite Quartet in A minor opened the Concert and Haydn's in D minor (Op. 9, No. 4) closed it. The latter work, which had only been given once before, ten years ago, is very slight and concise in structure, and was probably an early effort in quartet writing. Madame Schumann and Mr. Piatti played Nos. 1, 2, and 4 of Schumann's "Stücke im Volkston" (Op. 102). It is worthy of remark that while these pieces have been given a dozen times, Nos. 3 and 5 of the same set have not been heard once! It is difficult to account for this partiality, as the neglected numbers are fully equal to their favoured companions.

Miss Thudichum introduced two airs by Massenet and one by Brahms.

We fancy the audience on the following Monday would have been glad to hear Madame Schumann in some work of greater interest than three of Scarlatti's "Harpsichord Lessons." Without underrating the merit of the old Italian master's works, they need little more than neat and rapid execution in order to render them full justice, and we look for the exercise of higher qualities when Madame Schumann faces the keyboard. Compensation, however, was afforded afterwards by a magnificent performance of her husband's Quartet in E flat (Op. 47), which ranks second in popularity, amongst the master's works, to the incomparable Quintet in the same key. Of Beethoven's Quartet in E minor (Op. 59, No. 3) and Haydn's in G (Op. 17, No. 5) nothing need be said. Mr. Robertson sang with good taste Handel's "Where'er you walk" and Miss Maude White's "To Mary."

A rare treat was afforded those who attended the afternoon Concert of the 26th ult., the last we can notice this month. Schumann's magnificent Fantasia in C (Op. 17) was announced to be played by his widow. So far as we are aware, this work, one of the composer's most beautiful and most original utterances, had not been interpreted before by this great artist at these Concerts, and the performance was certainly in some measure a revelation. There was no storm or stress, even in the vigorous middle movement, of which Rubinstein gives such an astonishing reading, and the difficulties of which very few pianists wholly surmount. Madame Schumann's execution was well nigh faultless, and the tone was rich and grand in the extreme, without noise or coarseness. We could linger, did space permit, over one of the most superb examples of pianoforte-playing amateurs are ever likely to hear. Dr. Villiers Stanford's new Quintet in D minor (Op. 25), which we have noticed in Messrs. Coenen and Wiener's Concerts, was included in this programme. The composer took the piano part, and the work was very favourably received. The vocalist was Miss Kate Flinn, a young soprano, who sang airs by Weber and Widor with great taste.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The last three Concerts of Mr. Henschel's first season took place during the month just ended, the dates being respectively the 2nd, 9th, and 16th. As usual, each programme contained features of particular interest, more or less, and we are happy to say that the audiences were among the most numerous of the season. Already there are signs that Mr. Henschel's enterprise is working into the comparatively limited circle of accepted things. At the first of the Concerts now under review, three movements from Mr. F. H. Cowen's pretty Orchestral Suite, "In the Olden Time," were performed under the composer's direction. They comprised the Air, with variations, "Lullaby" and Minuet—the pick of the lot, perhaps, but, anyhow, very graceful and pleasing. Another feature of interest was a Concerto in D, for violoncello and orchestra, by Joseph Haydn. Here both music and performer were new, in the sense of being introduced for the first time. Who hears Haydn's Concertos now? save on a particular occasion when, say, a strange artist appears with an example which he has unearthed. The answer is much easier than that to another query: Why should they not be heard? It seems of little use to go for reasons to the music itself, Haydn being always melodious and masterly, and, may be, the right conclusion is that the concertos, like much else, have been crowded out, and that what we do not know or remember is, for practical purposes, non-existent. The Concerto was introduced by Mr. Julius Klengel, a performer well known in Belgium and Germany, where his repute stands high as that which he undoubtedly is—an executant of marked ability. His rendering of some "Variations Capriceuses" from his own pen set this fact in the strongest light, and made a marked impression. The orchestra played, with its now familiar efficiency, Schumann's Symphony in D minor, and the Overture to the "Mastersingers." Miss Emily Winant, the American contralto, made a "hit" with Liszt's "Kennst du das Land?"

The programme on the 9th contained an English novelty of first-class pretension—namely, a Symphony in C, from the pen of Mr. Henry Holmes, the well-known and esteemed violinist. This work is dated as far back as 1871—a fact duly laid before the audience, along with an intimation that it had never been performed before. We may draw our own conclusions, and infer either that Mr. Holmes kept his Symphony to himself, or had its public presentation refused by conductors and concert-givers who ought to have known better. Mr. Holmes calls his piece "Boscastle," after the little Cornish seaport where it was written; but we do not find in it any particular suggestion of the romantic scenery and associations which, we must presume, inspired it. True, the song of the thrush appears in an Interlude leading to the Finale, but that delightful bird has no special connection with the Cornish coast. Considerations such as these, however, are of minor importance. The real question is whether the Symphony possesses intrinsic value as music. It cannot be called great, since there are indications of lacking inspiration, and of a composer who is overweighted. On the other hand, the Symphony is not a thing lightly to be put aside. It reveals a composer whose high aim is largely warranted by the means at his disposal, and who, given a subject less exacting than in the present case, would be capable of very good symphonic work. Somewhat less elaboration and greater definiteness of expression would, undoubtedly, serve Mr. Holmes well. "Boscastle" was favourably received, and the composer had to bow his acknowledgments from the balcony. The rest of the programme need not long detain us. Mr. Schönberger played Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor in his usual dashing manner, relieved by intervals of grateful calm, and was much applauded; the purely orchestral selections being Wagner's "Dreams" (repeated by desire) and the Hungarian March in Berlioz's "Faust." Mrs. Henschel sang two songs delightfully.

In the closing programme were two pièces d'occasion—Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, written to commemorate the Jubilee of a King of Saxony, and Wagner's Kaiser-Marsch. We need not stop to say why these things were chosen, and no reader requires to be told what they are like. There may, however, be a necessity in some cases for the information that the tune which finishes the Overture is that of the Saxon National Anthem. It happens to be the tune of "God save the Queen" also, but when played in the first-named capacity, an English audience is not called upon to stand up. Schubert's great Symphony in C was the principal feature of the Concert, but it may be that a selection from the music of Lohengrin in the final act of Wagner's opera won greatest favour, because most delightfully sung by Mr. E. Lloyd.

We must congratulate Mr. Henschel upon the artistic success of his first season, and wish for his second all the popular support requisite to establish the enterprise.

THE BACH CHOIR.

Sticklers after consistency might ask why an association formed for the purpose of spreading a knowledge of the works of Bach should concern itself with an example of art so essentially modern as Schumann's "Genoveva." Between the sturdy old Leipzig Cantor and the dreamy creator of the imaginary "Davidsbündler" there is indeed a great gulf fixed. But we are not disposed to question the right of a Society calling itself after the name of one great composer, to enlarge the scope of its operations should it think fit. As no one else has thought proper to take up "Genoveva," the Bach Choir deserves hearty thanks for paying a debt long due. That Schumann's one opera would be a success on our stage is highly improbable, nor can it be said that even in concert-room form is it ever likely to be popular with choral Societies; but music frequently so beautiful should not be entirely lost to the world, and after the initiative of the Bach Choir we may at least hope to hear selections from time to time. A full description of the work and of its history appeared in the last number of The Musical Times, so we need not traverse the same ground; but we repeat that whatever may be the demerits of the libretto—and they are many—and whatever may have been Schumann's lack of insight into the needs of stage work, yet as abstract music much of "Genoveva" is exceedingly beautiful and original. The overture, occasionally heard at orchestral concerts, is a splendid symphonic movement, and nearly the whole of the first act is as fresh as it is masterly. In the second act the heroine has a prayer which only Schumann could have written, and there is also a fine Finale, which was omitted in the performance on the 8th ult. The incantation music in the third act is extremely picturesque, though perhaps not dramatic in the strict sense of the term, and the prayer and Finale of the last act are equal to anything that has gone before. Indeed, there is very little that is actually weak in the opera, though as a whole it is open to two objections. The first is, that the general character of the music is too lyrical, and the second that the composer overloads his accompaniments, the voices being frequently crushed beneath a mass of orchestration. Even at St. James's Hall, where, of course, the principal vocalists were placed in front of the band, the former could scarcely be heard in places. Truth to say, the soloists as a body were not particularly strong. Miss Pauline Cramer's stage experience of course stood her in good stead, but we cannot say that Miss Friedländer, Mr. B. Davies, Mr. D. Price, and Mr. W. H. Wing rendered full justice to their parts. The general performance, however, was praiseworthy, Dr. Villiers Stanford having obviously taken great pains at rehearsal. In order to impart a popular tone to the Concert, the selections from "Genoveva" were preceded by Beethoven's Violin Concerto, which enjoyed the inestimable advantage of Mr. Joachim as its interpreter. Bach was represented by his fine double chorus, "Now shall the grace," which had been heard on two former occasions.

It may be added that a considerable selection from "Genoveva" was performed, with pianoforte accompaniment, at the Hanover Square Rooms, on June 6th, 1864, for the benefit of the Friend of the Clergy Corporation, by the Amateur Musical Union, a society which devoted itself to the study of high-class music, and which, for many years, gave an annual Concert in aid of some public charity.

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL'S VOCAL RECITALS.

Among musical entertainments of a quiet and unpretentious character, these Recitals must be numbered with the most enjoyable. We might go further, and describe them as instructive, as by their means the public is made acquainted with a quantity of music of all ages and kinds, which has suffered undeserved neglect, by reason of the caprice or ignorance of concert-givers. A glance at the four programmes of the series, which commenced on February 11 and ended on the 11th ult., reveals the catholicity of Mr. Henschel's artistic spirit. Scarcely a composer of eminence is unrepresented, and many are included whose music has been well nigh forgotten for generations. Among the latter we may note J. W. Franck, Cimarosa, Carissimi, Giovannini, Paisiello, Lotti, Rameau, Marco da Gagliano, and Grétry. To comment seriatim on the many interesting items by these composers, as well as on the equally numerous pieces by more celebrated masters, which have suffered like neglect, would occupy too much space. In general terms the Recitals may be described as an educational treat, and the large attendance of the public showed the "artistic pair" (to use Spohr's words respecting himself and his wife) that their efforts were duly appreciated. Soon after Mr. and Mrs. Henschel's return to London next autumn the Recitals will be resumed.

MESSRS. COENEN AND WIENER'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Of all forms of music, classical chamber works seem now among the most popular. There is an obvious reason for this: amateurs can perform trios and quartets in the family circle, and by attending Concerts given by skilled professors they obtain valuable lessons at a small cost. In this way it is easy to account for the large audiences at the Princes' Hall on the 2nd and 23rd ult. We need not dwell here on the artistic claims of Messrs. Coenen and Wiener to consideration. Among resident foreign musicians they hold a respected place, the first as a pianist and the second as a violinist, and do excellent work in a comparatively modest way. Their first Concert was rendered interesting by the production of a Quintet in D minor (piano and strings), by Dr. Villiers Stanford. The work had been given previously at one of Mr. Dannreuther's Musical Evenings, but this was practically its first public performance. We have no hesitation in assigning it a high place among the Cambridge musician's achievements. One great point in its favour is the lucidity of the writing. The themes are frank and straightforward, and though the composer indulges freely in imitation and other contrapuntal devices, he is never vague and obscure. The Scherzo and Finale are extremely vigorous, and the Adagio full of expression. Beethoven's Quartet in E flat (Op. 74) was the only other work of importance at this Concert. There was nothing in the programme of the second Concert to call for more than formal record. The concerted works were Schubert's Quartet in D minor, and Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 25), in the execution of which the Concert-givers were assisted, as at the previous performance, by Messrs. Collins, Hollander, and Whitehouse.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

It might have been supposed that the wonderful increase in the study of the violin, especially among lady amateurs, would result in a corresponding diminution in the popularity of the piano, but such is not the case. On the contrary, recitals by professors of the latter instrument are becoming yearly more numerous, and if the player has any reputation he or she never lacks an audience. Many recitals have been given during the past month, but, speaking generally, they have been of minor significance, and a few lines with respect to each will suffice. The lead was taken by Mr. Alfred Napoleon, who appeared at Willis's Rooms on the 7th ult. Here was a solitary instance of a very thin attendance, though the entertainment was announced to be given on behalf of a charity. The cause was manifest; Mr. Napoleon was utterly unknown, and he had not advertised himself. Nor do we think he would be likely to win any great favour among us, pianists of the second rank being so numerous at present. In one respect his playing was admirable. Alike in Beethoven's Sonata in C sharp minor (Moonlight) and F minor (Appassionata), Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, and a Chopin selection, he was unerringly correct, false notes being conspicuous by their absence. But his style was singularly cold and mechanical, not the least trace of feeling or expression of any kind being observable even in the Chopin excerpts which, of course, suffered especially. To tear a passion to tatters and exaggerate every nuance, as is the custom with some pianists, is reprehensible, but Mr. Napoleon erred in the opposite direction.

Mr. Anton Hartvigson, who gave a Recital at the Princes' Hall, on the 10th ult., is a brother of the well-known executant and teacher, Mr. Fritz Hartvigson. Six composers were included in his scheme, which was headed by Beethoven's Waldstein Sonata. In this masterpiece the performer did not seem at home; mistakes were numerous, and the style generally was rough and unfinished. Afterwards there was an improvement, and there was little fault to find with the rendering of Chopin's Nocturne in F sharp, or the Etude in F, so far as regards digital accuracy. The last-named composer's rarely heard Ballade in F minor (No. 4) was included in the programme, the rest of which consisted of trifles.

The next to challenge public opinion was Mr. Max Pauer, who gave the first of two Recitals at the Princes' Hall, on the 16th ult. Comparisons may be odious, but it is only a matter of justice to Mr. Pauer to say that, as an executant, he is already far superior to either of the pianists mentioned above. We have had occasion elsewhere to note his steady artistic progress, and his efforts on the present occasion served to more than justify our remarks. Perhaps Mr. Pauer was at his best in Handel's Suite in D minor and some of Scarlatti's Harpsichord lessons. These were rendered with irreproachable neatness, and with delightful purity of touch. Beethoven's latest Sonata in C minor (Op. 111) was a more formidable task, and we do not doubt that the performer approached it with all care and reverence. The master's ripest utterances demand something more than perfection of technique for their interpretation, and only artists of experience can possibly enter into their spirit and realise to the full the sublime imaginings of the tone-poet. Judged from the highest standpoint, Mr. Pauer failed, and necessarily failed; but there were pleasant indications here and there that he possesses the divine fire, though as yet it may be little more than a spark. Included in the programme were some "Celebrated Transcriptions," but they were mercifully placed at the end of the programme, so that there was no occasion to endure them. The second Recital took place on the 30th ult., too late for notice in the present number.

On the 17th ult., Mr. Tobias Matthay gave a Recital at the Princes' Hall, but unlike the other pianists he did not rely wholly on his own resources, songs and duets being contributed by Miss Kate McKrill and Mdlle. Agnes Janson. These were much appreciated, but our business is rather with the instrumental portion of the programme, which included pieces by no fewer than nine composers. Mr. Matthay was formerly a student and is now a professor at the Royal Academy of Music, so that he comes before the public with excellent credentials. As an executant he is clever but unequal. Some of his selections were beautifully played while others were rendered in an eccentric and even slipshod manner. In Chopin's familiar Nocturne in D flat, his memory failed him; but immediately afterwards he gave a splendid rendering of the same composer's far more difficult Étude in A minor (Op. 25, No. 11). Judging from the three little pieces from his own pen, which served to play the audience out, Mr. Matthay has considerable talent for composition.

That Mr. Schönberger has won his way into public favour was shown by the large audience which attended his third Recital, in St. James's Hall, on the 25th ult. There is nothing to excite wonder in this; even those who recognise the serious inequalities in the young player's efforts, and who are pained by the coarseness and exaggeration into which he is sometimes betrayed, must admit that his gifts are above the average, and charitably attribute his defects to the effervescence of youth. Eight composers were represented at his third Recital, and some of them by important works. Thus we had Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 101), generally considered the earliest in the "third manner," and Schumann's Carnaval; also Bach's great organ Prelude and Fugue in A minor, as transcribed by Liszt; and Chopin's Ballade in G minor. Some portions of these, as well as some of the more trifling pieces by Schubert, Rubinstein, Liszt, and Chopin were charmingly played, while at other times Mr. Schönberger's aim seemed to be merely to astonish inartistic listeners rather than to satisfy connoisseurs. The most probable solution of the matter is that his faults are entirely due to inexperience, and we confidently hope that they will gradually disappear, and that he will eventually mature into a consummate artist.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The chief attraction of the Concert of the 3rd ult.—Mendelssohn's famous Octet—was reserved till the end of the programme, when it received a most excellent rendering from the following executants:—Messrs. Sutcliffe, Inwards, S. Blagrove, and Miss Donkersley (violins), Messrs. Kreuz and Bent (violas), Messrs. Squire and A. Blagrove (cellos). Such a work, brimful of freshness, is more likely to have full justice done to it by youthful performers than Brahms's fine Quartet in B flat (Op. 67), with which the Concert opened, though in the latter work Messrs. Sutcliffe, S. Blagrove, Kreuz, and Squire—a very well balanced quadrilateral—were heard to great advantage, the first-named player recalling at every turn the refinement of style, pure tone, and delicacy of expression which have always marked his master, Mr. Henry Holmes. A comparatively novel feature at this Concert was the harp solo—Parish Alvars's "Danse des Fées"—contributed by Mr. Frederick Barker, a young player of the greatest promise, whose efforts met with a most enthusiastic reception. Miss Hallett, the pianoforte soloist of the evening, played Liszt's "Bénédiction de Dieu dans la solitude," with her usual crispness and intelligence, and Miss Elvidge sang Mozart's trying but beautiful scena "Ch' io mi scordi" and "Non temer," with good enunciation and refinement of conception, though vocally overweighted. Miss Roberts and Miss M. Davies also contributed a duet by Bellini.

The forty-sixth of these Concerts—and the last to be held in the West Theatre, Albert Hall—opened with Beethoven's Trio in E flat (Op. 70, No. 2), in which the piano, violin, and cello parts were efficiently sustained by Miss Oldham, Mr. Bent, and Mr. Squire, and wound up with Brahms's String Quartet in B flat (Op. 67), repeated "by desire," by the four players who had rendered it so excellently the week before. Considerable promise was shown in her interpretation of Chopin's Andante Spianato and Polonaise (Op. 22) by Miss P. Fletcher, a young lady whose style of playing, though rather sketchy and wanting in force, is marked by delicacy and a certain individuality of its own. Mr. S. Blagrove, the useful second violin of the leading College quartet, showed marked improvement in his playing of a "Légende" by Wieniawski. Mr. Houghton's light and agreeable tenor was heard in the air "O meadow clad in early green" ("May Queen"), and here again greater smoothness and more refinement were observable. Miss Nunn and Miss Spring Rice, without proving themselves possessed of any remarkable natural resources, gave evidence of good training—in the matter of enunciation particularly—and of refined conception in two duets "O lovely peace" (Handel), and Schumann's beautiful "Country Song" (Op. 29, No. 1).

Thursday, the 17th ult., was an important date in the annals of these Concerts, for on that day the Concert Hall in the Alexandra House, opened on the previous Monday by the Princess of Wales, was placed, for the first time, at the disposal of the Royal College pupils. What this charming hall lacks in seating power, as compared with the West Theatre of the Albert Hall, it more than makes up in comfort, beauty, and acoustic properties. The latter are, indeed, of quite phenomenal excellence. The new organ, an excellent instrument, was shown off by Miss Philpott, who gave J. S. Bach's Fugue in E flat (St. Ann's) in sound style, while the second number on the programme—a solostück for violin, by Kiel—a singularly ad captandum composition for so learned a composer—served to reveal in the player, Miss Elieson, a young artist who bids fair some day to rival Signora Teresina Tua on her own ground. Miss Elieson, who has been awarded a scholarship in the recent competition, has every quality for success, and displays already an amount of aplomb truly remarkable in so youthful a performer. The chief attractions in the way of concerted music were Schumann's String Quartet in A minor, excellently played by Messrs. Sutcliffe, S. Blagrove, Kreuz, and Squire; and Brahms's Quartet in A, for piano and strings, in which Miss Kellett rendered the unusually difficult pianoforte part of this truly noble work with great vigour and decision. Mr. Squire gave as a solo Boccherini's Sonata in G, arranged by his master, Mr. Howell, besides appearing in a third capacity—that of a composer—his graceful setting of Longfellow's words "Who love would seek," sympathetically sung by his sister, receiving the well-earned honour of an encore. Miss Squire also sang the fine aria from "Cosi fan tutte," "Per pietà, ben mio," in very acceptable style.

"THE GOLDEN LEGEND" IN AMERICA.

The first performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's "The Golden Legend" in America took place in Chicago, on the 11th ult., when the work was given by the Apollo Club, in the Music Hall. Much pains had been expended on the preparation of the Cantata, and the result was an excellent rendering of the music. The solos were undertaken by Miss Butler, whose voice was somewhat too light for the music she had to sing; Miss Nielson, who showed great promise; Mr. Mockridge, who sang the tenor part with sweetness, but a lack of power; and Mr. Heinrich, who rendered the part of Lucifer with much vigour and artistic taste. The choir sang their part of the work with great vigour and precision, the "Evening Hymn" being the feature of the choral portion. The orchestra was satisfactory, and Mr. William L. Tomlins conducted with his accustomed ability. "The Golden Legend" was preceded by Gounod's Third Mass in E flat. The Society propose to repeat both works during next season.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The last Hallé Concert, held on the 1st ult., served only by its perfection and comprehensiveness to intensify the regrets which the frequenters of these Concerts feel in contemplating their final termination, so far as Liverpool is concerned. They had become such a positive factor in the music of the city, and such an essential feature amongst the performances given at the Philharmonic Hall, that when the next season comes round it will be hard to accustom oneself to the blank.

The appearance of Mr. Joachim at this concluding Concert was warmly greeted by an audience anxious to show their sympathy with the occasion, and his two selections, Viotti's Concerto in A minor and Schumann's "Fantasie," were listened to with that marked attention which indicates the supreme ability of the artist. Comment on such a performance would be superfluous. The purely orchestral work opened with Mozart's Overture to "Idomeneo," and also included Goldmark's Overture "Sakuntala" and Weber's appropriate "Jubilee." The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 8, in F, which was splendidly played, every point of the wonderfully vivacious Finale being given out with immense verve and effect. The remaining orchestral item was the popular Introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," which was repeated at the vehement request of the audience. The vocalist at this Concert was Miss Lily Crabtree, an artist with lyrical aspirations; and her selections, Meyerbeer's "Vanne, Vanne," Mendelssohn's "Infelice," and a Waltz "Marinella," by Randegger, gave evidence of a fine voice and execution, which will doubtless be mellowed and perfected by greater experience. The worthy Conductor, Mr. Hallé, was the recipient of a most genuine and well-merited recall at the conclusion of the performance.

One of the most important events of the season has been the performance, on the 15th ult., under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, of Dr. Stanford's "Three Holy Children." Dr. Stanford himself conducted, the principals being Miss Mary Davies; Mr. Bridson, as the King; and Messrs. Piercy, Bantock Pierpoint, and Hilton, as the Three Hebrew Youths. These artists were all competent, but the concerted music did not always give thorough satisfaction, mainly attributable to the occasional undue prominence of the band. The feature, however, of the Oratorio, is undoubtedly its choral character, and the effective close to the first part and the massive double chorus at the end are distinguished by fine writing and powerful effects. In this, and their other numbers, the Society's "practicals" earned high praise for the care and intelligence which they displayed, and which would have been enhanced had their knowledge of the work, and consequent confidence in its rendering, been a little more certain. Mr. Best's assistance at the organ was again invaluable, and the Conductor, during the course of the performance, had many indications of the hearty approbation of his audience.

The first performance in public of Dr. W. H. Hunt's "Stabat Mater" is an event which deserves due prominence. The occasion was a sacred Concert given in the New Town Hall, Birkenhead, on the 14th ult., in aid of St. John's Chancel and Organ Fund, and the discriminative but cordial reception given to Dr. Hunt's ambitious work affords a good augury for its future success and popularity. It is superfluous to say that the clever contrapuntal effects, and the, at times, elaborate scoring, are based on true scientific principles, when it is remembered that the work was the test exercise which gained the Doctor his degree; and it is only necessary to quote the melodious tenor air "Quis est homo," the rich workmanship of the chorus "Inflammatus," the unaccompanied quartet "Juxta crucem" and the concluding fugal "Amen" to testify to the ability of the composer. The principals were Miss A. G. Allan, Miss Armstrong, Mr. T. Barlow, and Mr. W. H. Allan; and the chorus, under the conductorship of Dr. Hunt, by their careful singing contributed to an admirable performance. The accompaniments devolved upon Mr. W. A. Roberts and Mr. H. E. Blenkarn at the pianoforte, and Mr. E. Townshend Driffield at the harmonium, and were excellently rendered throughout.

After a lapse of twelve years, Liverpool has had an opportunity of again hearing Spohr's Oratorio "Calvary." The performance was given on the 24th ult., at the Cathedral Church of St. Peter, and was due entirely to the enterprise of the Cathedral organist, Mr. F. H. Burstall, who has, during the last few years, done so much to revive classical church music of this character. In commenting on the rendering of the work, allowance must necessarily be made for the cramped space and facilities of the Pro-Cathedral; but bearing in mind these drawbacks, the efficiency of the performance was all the more creditable. The chorus, composed practically of the Cathedral choir, had been very thoroughly trained, and were always effective, particularly in the dramatic episodes of the second part; and of the principals, Mr. Edward Grime gained special distinction. Mr. Collins was at the organ, and Mr. Burstall conducted throughout.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

Before referring to the musical events of March, I ought to say a few words about a rather important Concert of the local Festival Choral Society, which fell too late in February for notice in my last. It was noteworthy chiefly as the occasion of the first performance in Birmingham of Verdi's "Requiem," a work which may be said to have come as a revelation upon that large class of music lovers who previously knew the composer only through his lyric or secular works. Since Rossini's "Stabat Mater," with which it has strong affinities, in its essentially dramatic and even impassioned character, its wealth of melody and gorgeous colouring, no service music that has been produced here has so deeply interested and impressed the public, and the early repetition of the "Requiem," therefore, may be safely predicted. Its performance on this occasion, though not absolutely irreproachable, was under many aspects very praiseworthy, and it awoke frequent and enthusiastic applause from a crowded audience. The vocal principals were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Damian, Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Foli. The band and chorus, specially reinforced for the occasion, numbered 400 performers. Mr. W. Astley Langston presided at the organ, and Mr. Stockley, as usual, conducted. Among the numbers which most impressed the audience were the thrilling "Dies iræ," the dulcet duet "Recordare," with its exquisite and fanciful instrumentation; the tenor air "Ingemisco," in which Mr. Edward Lloyd won great applause; the pathetic "Lachrimosa," the lovely offertorio "Domine Jesu Christe," the fugal "Sanctus," ushered in by trumpet blasts; the "Agnus Dei" duet, and the final "Libera me," which latter was the first number written by Verdi, as his contribution to the Composite Requiem originally planned in commemoration of Rossini. Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," in which the same principals, with the exception of Signor Foli, took part, furnished the second part of the Concert, which may be reckoned altogether one of the most successful the Society has given for some years.

At the annual Invitation Concert of the Birmingham Clef Club, which took place on the 2nd ult., a programme of much musical interest was submitted, including, as usual, several novelties. Among these may be mentioned a new and charmingly written Part-song, by Mr. A. R. Gaul, entitled "The Children"—an Andante con moto in G major, changing on the third verse to G minor, which was capitally sung and enthusiastically applauded. Dr. Mackenzie contributed an arrangement of his "Rhapsodie Ecossaise" (No. 1, Op. 21), originally produced at Edinburgh some seven years ago, for pianoforte duet, violins, viola, violoncello, and contra-basso, in which the composer was joined at the pianoforte by Madame Agnes Miller. The lady played Mendelssohn's Fantasia in F sharp minor (Op. 28) in her usual finished style, and Mr. F. Ward, the violinist, delighted his hearers with an expressive rendering of Vieuxtemps's graceful "Rêverie." Dr. Mackenzie's new Part-song "The three merry dwarfs" met with a very cordial reception. The pièce de resistance of the Concert was Spohr's Nonetto in E flat (Op. 31), which was very effectively rendered by a group of our principal local professional players; and Mrs. Helen Trust's vocal contributions, including songs in French and German, by Massenet, Gounod, and Grieg, furnished a pleasant relief to the instrumental performances.

The March Concert of the musical section of the Midland Institute, which took place on the 5th ult., was in the nature of a Pianoforte Recital, for which the services of our young and talented townswoman, Miss Fanny Davies, had been secured. Bach's "Italian" Overture and Schumann's Third Sonata in G minor, constituted the first group of selections, and was followed, after a brief interval, by Schubert's Impromptu in B flat, introducing a theme from the Rosamunde music, and Mendelssohn's Capriccio in F sharp minor (Op. 5). Another brief interval was followed by a selection of Chopin's minor compositions, and then came Sterndale Bennett's musical sketch "The Lake," and Graun's fiery Gigue in B flat minor, with which the Concert concluded. Miss Davies was in excellent form, and charmed the audience no less by the grace, fervour, and expressiveness of her playing, than by the unfaltering excellence of her technique. The Schubert Impromptu, with its charming variations and brilliant scale passages, created a deep impression, and the vigour and fire infused into the Gigue by Graun provoked loud and long continued applause.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company concluded a three weeks' season at the Grand Theatre, on the night of the 5th, when a crowded audience responded to the perennial attractions of Bizet's "Carmen," with Madame Marie Roze as the fickle and fascinating Gipsy, Mr. Barton McGuckin as the amorous dragoon, José, and Mr. Leslie Crotty as his rival, the Toreador Escamillo. In the course of the short season, no less than four performances were given of Mr. F. Corder's new opera "Nordisa," which is, perhaps, the best testimony that could be rendered to its popular qualities, even under all the local disadvantages of imperfect mise en scène and limited mechanical resources. Next to "Carmen," the most popular work in the Carl Rosa répertoire, judged by the attendance here, is "Lohengrin," of which the second performance, with Madame Roze as Elsa, drew a larger attendance even than the first. On the other hand, Mozart's once popular "Marriage of Figaro," with Miss Marion Burton as Cherubino and Madame Blanche Cole as the Countess, met with a very poor reception, and Flotow's light and tuneful opera "Martha," which was given here for the first time by the Carl Rosa Company, with Madame Burns as Martha and Miss Marion Burton as Nancy, fared no better.

One of the best musical entertainments of the season was that given by Messrs. Harrison, on the 7th ult., as the final Concert of the series. The vocalists on this occasion were Madame Alwina Valleria and Mr. Frederic King, Signor Piatti was the solo violoncellist, and Mr. Charles Hallé the pianist; but the burden of the entertainment devolved upon that gentleman's admirably organised band, which appears to have been lately reinforced in the string department. The feature of the Concert was Schumann's Grand Symphony in C major, which was splendidly played, and excited great interest, the applause being especially hearty after the Beethovenish opening Allegro and the delightful Scherzo in A minor, with its two trios. Another novelty was a couple of pieces from a recent Suite by Rubinstein, entitled "Bal costumé." In Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture, and that to Weber's "Freischütz," the band also acquitted itself very creditably. Signor Piatti played two movements from the Concerto of Molique in his most finished style, and was even more effective in the solemn prayerful Largo from Boccherini's Fifth Sonata, and a fancifully-scored "Bergamasco," or native dance of Bergamo, of his own composition. Mr. Charles Hallé's contributions comprised Liszt's dainty arrangement of the "Spinnerlied," from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," one of the same master's "Rhapsodies Hongroises," and, in reply to an encore of the latter performance, Chopin's tuneful Valse in D flat major (Op. 64). Madame Alwina Valleria sang a dramatic scena, "The Vigil," by H. J. Edwards, and a new and tastefully-scored vocal Gavotte, by Arditi, which seems likely to rival the popularity of the composer's Waltz "Il bacio." Mr. King was not in his best voice, but he pleased the audience in that tuneful but somewhat hackneyed Ballad from Balfe's "Maid of Artois," "The light of other days."

Among the minor events of the month may be mentioned the Concert given by the Ladies' Singing Class of the Midland Institute, on the 1st ult., when the ladies were assisted by a goodly contingent of male vocalists, both amateur and professional, and a band. Hofmann's Cantata, "Melusina," the principal item of the evening, was very creditably rendered, under the conductorship of Mr. A. R. Gaul. Miss Lilian Dixon won great applause for her rendering of Beethoven's Violin Romance in G, with orchestral accompaniment. The same young lady acquitted herself very effectively in De Beriot's First Concerto at a recent Concert of the Birmingham Musical Association. I find I did an involuntary injustice to this last-named organisation in my recent reference to the performance of Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty," the credit of which should have been given to the Musical Association, under the conductorship of Mr. G. Halford, not the Musical Society. At the monthly meeting of the Birmingham and Musical Guild, on the 7th ult., Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap was elected President in succession to Mr. A. J. Sutton, and Mr. Charles Lunn read an able paper on "Sensation, Impressions, Ideas." At the first Concert of the newly-formed Aston Musical Association, on the 3rd ult., "The Messiah" was performed, under the conductorship of Mr. Noake.

The Queen's visit has caused some slight disturbance of local musical arrangements this month, and the fourth Concert of the Festival Choral Society, announced for the 24th, had to be postponed till May, owing to the Town Hall being required for the Royal ceremony. On the other hand, the event furnished occasion for a special musical performance by the Town Hall Organist and the members of the Festival Choral Society, to which a few words are due. Among the choral pieces, those which appeared to give most satisfaction were the "Hallelujah," from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," and Handel's "Let their celestial concerts all unite." During the Royal luncheon the unaccompanied singing of Webbe's "When winds breathe soft" and Mendelssohn's "Morning Prayer" was specially praiseworthy for delicacy, perfect intonation, and light and shade. Mr. Astley Langston's organ selection comprised Offertoires by Batiste and Wély and Smart's "Festive March."

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

Our Concert season is now rapidly closing, although we expect to enjoy throughout the summer a great deal of music in connection with the Jubilee Exhibition, for which most active exertions are being made. At the opening—May 3rd—Mr. Hallé's choir and orchestra will supply the music; and, in addition to a special band organised by Mr. de Jong, numerous military bands will be heard afterwards from time to time. Probably choral performances also will be vouchsafed, but no announcement has yet been officially made. A large organ is being erected by Messrs. Bishop and Son, that should afford Mr. Pyne and other eminent performers ample means of display. Forty-seven speaking stops, with the most complete mechanical arrangements, and with a contrivance for instantaneously changing the apparent pitch, should render the instrument equal to all demands. At least one new work by a native composer is secured for the festal day, when the Prince of Wales is to be present; but regret is felt that the most eminent of our national musicians will not contribute, and that others entitled to a hearing have not been invited to do honour to the occasion.

Turning to the doings of the past month, I should mention that after a very excellent programme on the 3rd ult.—including Beethoven's Symphony in B flat, solos by Mr. Joachim, and the first appearance here of Miss Lily Crabtree—Mr. Hallé closed his regular series of Concerts with "The Golden Legend." A very crowded audience assembled to hear a work so highly commended, and although the performance certainly did not rival that at Leeds, great delight was testified that Sir Arthur Sullivan should have produced so classic, poetic, and tuneful a work, and have revived the hopes of those who persistently look to him as the foremost champion of English music. In the latter part of the programme a very serious and quaint German "Dialogue" of the sixteenth century, by A. Becker, produced a striking impression. The choral responses, in very full harmony, to the questions asked by the soloist, were rendered very impressively; and upon those present, who, that morning, had stood by the grave-side of Mr. E. Hecht (to whose sudden and lamented death reference is elsewhere made), had a great effect. Before "The Golden Legend" the "Dead March" was eloquently played.

For the first time Mr. Hallé has given a "benefit" Concert at the close of his regular course of performances.

Whether his subscribers have had enough of Berlioz's "Faust," given for the eleventh time, or from whatever cause, the audience was not so numerous as might have been expected.

Several other "benefit" Concerts have been given of late: Mr. De Jong's on the last Saturday in February, and Mr. G. W. Lane's on Saturday, the 12th ult. At the latter, "Acis and Galatea" was given, perhaps rather too boldly with a young choir; although, evidently, a large assembly of friends thought differently.

At the Concert Hall, on the 22nd ult., the orchestral programme, including Beethoven's Symphony in D, was very well rendered. Mr. Lloyd was in good voice, and a young cellist, Mr. Fuchs, made a favourable impression. A very pleasant Chamber Concert was given on the 8th ult., with Messrs. Hallé, Straus, Risegari, Bernhardt, and Piatti. Cherubini's String Quartet in E flat, Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 69), for piano and cello, and Haydn's String Quartet in C (Op. 33, No. 3), were included.

Mr. Risegari finished his own series of Chamber Concerts on the 5th ult., to a much larger audience than used to reward his efforts. The change of evenings evidently has been beneficial, and there now is, happily, every prospect of these admirable performances enjoying their fair share of popular favour.

Most of our choral bodies have finished their work. The Athenæum Musical Society gave its third Concert on the 7th ult., the room being crowded as usual. Many of our young and promising vocalists make their début under the auspices of this Society, and the Concerts are watched with great interest.

Mr. Carl Rosa's opera season of a month has been most successful. On almost every occasion the Theatre Royal has been completely filled. Mr. F. Corder's "Nordisa" has been given as many as four times a week, and has proved most attractive. Other novelties have, perhaps, been too sparingly given; but probably the exigencies of the management have ruled this. The band has been enlarged, and is now as complete as could reasonably be looked for in a travelling party. Altogether, Mr. Rosa must have been more than satisfied with the reception of his efforts and the reward of his enterprise.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The month has been one of the most interesting and profitable that Yorkshire musicians probably ever experienced. Bradford has witnessed a never-to-be-forgotten performance of Berlioz's "Messe des Morts"; in Huddersfield a hearing has been given to a very remarkable work, by one of the foremost English musicians; and Leeds, Bradford, and Halifax have been favoured with the presence of Joachim and other great executants, whose visits are so rare as to justify a great amount of local excitement.

The production of Berlioz's great Mass, on the 4th ult., attracted more attention on the part of musicians than probably any other single performance ever given in the West Riding. It is scarcely needful to account for this all-absorbing interest. The work had never previously been given in the provinces, and Mr. August Manns, to whom the credit of its first production in England belongs, had alone brought it to a hearing at the Crystal Palace and in Glasgow. The honour of the Bradford enterprise is due to Mr. W. B. Sewell, whose energy and perseverance, under discouraging circumstances, have been more than once noted in these columns. In attempting the performance at Bradford, he set himself an immense task, and risked no slight monetary consideration. His courage, however, was rewarded in complete artistic success, and by fair pecuniary results. The elaborate injunctions of the composer as to the resources to be employed were not quite followed out to the letter, but the only reduction of any moment was in the number of violins employed. The entire force consisted of 150 instrumentalists and 200 vocalists, who were divided strictly in the proportions prescribed by Berlioz. The rendering of the work was eminently satisfactory. The technicalities with which it bristles were overcome with apparent ease by the band, and certainly without any notable slips. The voices were most taxed, the demands made by the composer upon the vocal forces being extremely severe. Occasionally the voices were overpowered by the tremendous outpouring of sound from the instruments, as in the "Rex tremendæ," and once or twice there was a notable want of refinement where it was needed to secure the precise effect. The forces were kept well in hand by Mr. Sewell, to whom, at the close of the performance, a laurel wreath was handed, amid much cheering, on behalf of band and chorus. The orchestra afterwards entertained Mr. Sewell at supper, at which were present representatives of all the local musical societies, and, in responding to the toast of his health, the young Conductor intimated that he proposed to produce some equally important works by English composers, and deplored past neglect of English art.

The increased attention which is being manifested in the direction of native compositions forms one of the most notable features of the work accomplished in this part of the country during the season now drawing to a close. In most of our large towns many English works have been given by the leading societies with much success. Among other organisations which have taken up the cause of native art, is the Huddersfield Choral Society, which distinguished itself by the production of Mr. Prout's Cantata "Hereward," on the 11th ult., the occasion being their third Concert of the season. Although it first came before the public in 1879, the work has seldom been heard in the provinces, and, considering that it is somewhat exacting in technical requirements, the Huddersfield organisation is entitled to not a little credit for giving it a hearing. That the Choral Society have both resources and skill is well known, and the Cantata was in safe hands. Mr. Prout's treatment of the attractive story gained him many fresh admirers, especially among those who are ever ready to appreciate anything so truly English. The choir made good use of its opportunities in the quaint "Salve Regina," the charming pastoral "Bright is the day," "Mourn, Anglia, mourn," and the double chorus "Hail, Saxons, hail." The richly coloured orchestral score played a very important part in the general effect. The instrumental introduction, in which the two leading themes, the Hereward or War motive, and the Torfrida or Love motive, have much prominence, was given with precision, clearness, and purity of tone, which were equally well sustained in subsequent numbers for the orchestra. Miss Annie Marriott made the most of the splendid solo music allotted to Torfrida, and Miss Clara Leighton and Miss Wilkinson were both satisfactory in the work which they undertook as exponents of smaller parts. The music written for the part of Hereward was rendered by Mr. Holberry Hagyard, whose best effort was in the grand scena "Ah! restless is the peace." Mr. Brereton, in essaying the difficult parts of Herluin the priest, and William, acquitted himself admirably. The Conductor was Mr. John North, whose abilities were fully equal to the occasion.

Mr. Joachim has appeared at four Concerts in the West Riding during the month, being accompanied at three of these by Mr. Piatti. At the concluding Bradford Subscription Concert, given on the 11th ult., Mr. Joachim was the solo executant, and with the assistance of Mr. Hallé's band, gave Viotti's Concerto in A minor, the one alone, perhaps, of the many works written by that representative of the classical Italian school which keeps his name before the public. The other violin solo of the evening was a Romance in A, by Max Bruch. At the same Concert the band gave three Overtures, namely, Cherubini's "Lodoiska," Mendelssohn's "Marriage of Camacho," and Weber's "Jubilee," together with a selection from Moszkowski's Orchestral Suite in F. But the chief orchestral item of the evening was Schumann's Grand Symphony in B flat, which was in every respect a rare treat. Miss Emily Winant was the vocalist, and made an excellent impression in selections from Handel, Weber, Saint-Saëns, and Ponchielli. At the Huddersfield Subscription Concert, on the 15th ult., Mr. Joachim, Mr. Piatti, and Miss Fanny Davies gave Schumann's Trio in D minor and Beethoven's Trio in G major. The violinist selected for his solos works by Tartini and Bach. Mr. Piatti and Miss Davies also gave delightful solo performances. The Huddersfield programme was repeated at Halifax, on the 17th ult., on the occasion of the last of Mr. Sykes's Subscription Concerts.

At the closing Concert of Mr. Ford's season, which took place on the 16th ult., Mr. Joachim, Mr. Piatti, and Miss Fanny Davies had the assistance of Mr. Eckener and Mr. Gibson in the rendering of several interesting items. To musicians the programme was full of attractive things, including, as it did, Beethoven's Trio in B flat, Schumann's Piano Concerto in G minor, Rubinstein's Sonata for piano and violoncello, in D, and Schubert's String Quartet in D minor. In addition to these there were solos by the leading executants, Mr. Joachim's piece being the Romance from his own Hungarian Concerto, and three Hungarian Dances. The vocalist was Miss Bertha Moore, whose songs were well received.

A Concert was given by Mr. Pohlmann, of Halifax, at the Albert Hall, Leeds, on the 10th ult., in aid of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, on which occasion Mr. Alfred F. Christensen's new Cantata, "The Discontented Maidens," was produced. The work, composed solely for ladies' voices, is based upon the incident of four "maidens," of different social positions, being discontented with their respective lots in life, and exchanging places, the Cantata ending with their return to their former duties and associations. The music is exceedingly bright and melodious, and was received with warm applause. The principal parts were ably sustained by Miss Julie Schow-Rosing, Miss Emilie Norton, Miss Marie Lummert, and Miss Marianne Tomlinson. The pianoforte accompaniment was played by Mr. W. Booth, and Mr. Alfred Benton presided at the harmonium. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

There is very little to chronicle during the past month, the Lenten season having so far been marked by a more than ordinary abstinence from Concerts of all sorts. It is also much to be regretted that the special services which used once to be held in our Cathedral, with a large voluntary choir, and occasional orchestral accompaniment, when works of magnitude were worthily rendered, no longer have a place in the scheme of the authorities. It is true that there are services held there on one evening in the week, when anthems of greater length and importance than usual are given; but there is no addition to the ordinary forces, and it seems that the position of taking the lead in the musical services of the city thus vacated by the mother church is being taken up by the Church of St. Mary Redcliffe, where sacred works are not infrequently given with large choir and full orchestra.

A very creditable performance of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" was given by the Bristol Musical Association, at the Colston Hall, on the 12th ult. This work has frequently been given in Bristol under various auspices, and always proves very popular. It was not the first time of its performance by this Society, and many of the choruses showed a marked advance upon the last time of its production, though some were very unsteady, notably "The upper air burst into life," where the start was unsatisfactory, but the organ finally seemed to pull both band and chorus together. The work of all the performers was hearty and energetic throughout, and Mr. Gordon, the Conductor, had evidently bestowed pains upon the preparation of the Concert. The solos were intrusted to Miss Adeline Paget, Miss Annie Chester, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. W. Lees, who were all fairly successful in their efforts. The leader was Mr. F. Gardner; organist, Mr. George Riseley; and harp obbligato, Mr. French Davis. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous.

At St. Thomas's Church, Salisbury, on the 17th ult., a special orchestral service was held, when Part II. of Farmer's Oratorio "Christ and His Soldiers" was excellently rendered by a large choir, accompanied by a full band and organ. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Sly and Master W. Aylward, sopranos; Mr. J. A. Pitman, alto (of Salisbury Cathedral); Mr. Morton and Rev. J. W. Barrow, tenors; and Messrs. Crook and Perry, basses. Mr. South (Organist of the Cathedral) presided at the organ, and Mr. Augustus Aylward (the Organist of the Church) conducted. There was a large congregation, who listened most attentively to the service. The Vicar, the Rev. H. G. Rogers, gave an excellent address on Oratorio music in our churches.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

Since the beginning of the year, Oxford has been fully supplied with musical performances, and it will only be possible to take a very brief survey of the occurrences of interest that have taken place since my last letter. The lately formed Oxford City Male Voice Union first challenges attention. This Society made its public début on January 7, and was fortunate enough to get the loan of the hall of Balliol College for the occasion. The members mustered some fifty strong, and created a most favourable impression, many of the pieces being sung with an attention to light and shade that reflected the greatest possible credit on the Conductor, Mr. H. B. Wilsdon. About a month later (February 14), another good Concert of music for men's voices was given in the same hall by a number of selected voices from the Collegiate Choirs, conducted by Mr. John Farmer. The special attraction was Brahms's Op. 41, but the programme and singing were excellent throughout.

The University Musical Union gave an invitation Concert, in the hall of Keble College, on February 22, at which the performers were Messrs. G. H. Betjemann, L. R. Hann, H. Channell, A. Pezze, and G. R. Betjemann, who gave a remarkably fine performance of Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet in E flat, the best, indeed, that we can remember to have heard in Oxford. The other features of interest in the Concert were Grieg's Sonata in G (Op. 13), for pianoforte and violin, excellently rendered by the Messrs. Betjemann, and a vocal quartet composed for the Society by Dr. Roberts, of Magdalen College. The audience were treated to analytical programmes, a luxury uncommon here.

Two days later the University Glee and Madrigal Society gave a Concert in the Sheldonian Theatre, under the direction of Dr. Roberts, and again exhibited the beautiful quality of tone and accuracy of style for which they have justly established a reputation. The best things in the programme were Monteverde's "Thine am I, dearest," and two songs contributed by Mr. Ferguson, the new Academical Clerk at Magdalen College. Orlando Lassus's "Matona, lovely maiden," also received much applause, and the whole Concert was thoroughly good and interesting,

Sir Frederick Ouseley lectured on the 1st ult., taking for his subject "Stage music in England from 1660 to 1710." The illustrations consisted of a chorus by Dr. Blow and excerpts from Purcell's operas, but require no special notice. The next day (2nd ult.) the Sheldonian Theatre was filled to its utmost capacity by an overflowing audience anxious to hear a new Oratorio called "Hezekiah," composed as an Exercise for the degree of Doctor of Music by Mr. Dodds, the Organist of Queen's College. Taking into account the difficulties that beset conductors on such occasions, the performance was remarkably good. In the elaborate numbers the composer showed great command of contrapuntal resource, while an unaccompanied Quartet, "Turn thee again," and the setting of a "Litany" by Mr. Swinburne, introduced into the libretto, indicated the possession of musical feeling as well as learning. Some of the orchestral effects were also admirable.

On the 3rd ult. the Philharmonic Society gave "Elijah," in the Sheldonian Theatre. Amongst the soloists were Miss Anna Williams and Mr. Santley. Unless it be to remark that the choruses went well, and that Mr. Santley was in remarkably fine voice, it seems unnecessary to do more than chronicle the performance of such familiar music by such well-known artists.

The most notable musical event of the term took place on the 9th ult., when the Musical Club engaged Mr. Joachim for a Concert in the Sheldonian Theatre. The great violinist had not been heard in Oxford for many years, and much interest was excited by his re-appearance. That the audience were not disappointed goes without saying. The soli selected were Bach's Chaconne in E minor, a Recitative and Adagio by Spohr, and two Hungarian Dances (Brahms-Joachim). The Pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 25), by Brahms, with which the Concert opened, once more proved what an excellent pianist we have amongst us in the person of Mr. Franklin Harvey. Altogether the Concert was eminently successful, and the proceeds must have left—what is very rare in Oxford—a large surplus to be devoted to the benefit of the institution that organised the performance.

On the 11th ult. Bach's "Matthew Passion" was sung in the Cathedral. Though the rendering of the music did not come up to the standard of the extraordinarily fine performance given many years ago under Dr. Corfe's direction, it was nevertheless very creditable, and a special word of praise is due to the singers who took the difficult tenor part. Many of the Recitatives had to be so much altered, that we doubt whether the composer would have known them, but this circumstance, though to be deplored, was probably inevitable in the want of a tenor voice of the exceptional height required. What to omit is always a debatable point, and the absence of some of the most beautiful and familiar numbers was doubtless unavoidable. The work was repeated on the 18th ult.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND WEST OF SCOTLAND.

The Concert season in this district is quickly drawing to a close, and the chief musical interest is the giving and attending "demonstrations" on the part of the numerous church and other associations by whom the art is specially cultivated. That, in the case of musical societies connected with churches, the general character of the worship is being raised by their means, there can be no doubt whatever. The contrast between the present time and, say, twenty-five years ago, when I first knew Glasgow, is indeed very marked. Then there was either absolute indifference or ignorance on the one hand, or rough undisciplined vigour on the other; now there is knowledge, skill, and refinement all applied to the best use to which the musical art can be put—the worship of the Sanctuary. With these few preliminary remarks I proceed to give, in chronological order, as usual, a record of our musical doings since my last report. After a blank interval of a fortnight or three weeks, following the close of the Choral Union series of Concerts, came first in order a Concert by the Hillhead Ladies' Choir, on the 14th ult., in the St. Andrew's Berkeley Hall, the occasion being, strictly speaking, their annual Conversazione. The principal item in the programme was Roeckel's "Westward Ho!" The choir is chiefly connected with one of the West End Churches, and was originally formed to assist in the Children's Afternoon Service of Praise, in which, of course, it still, in portion at least, takes part. Mr. G. Richmond fills the post of Conductor to the Society.

A Concert was given by the Albert Select Choir, on the 15th ult., in the Waterloo Rooms, at which a number of part-songs and glees were rendered with excellent taste and effect, the choir, which numbers thirty, aiming at a special interpretation of such music. Mr. John Lillie conducted, and there was an encouraging attendance on the part of the public.

A performance of Haydn's Oratorio "The Creation" was given by the choir of Pollok Street United Presbyterian Church, on the 15th ult. The choir was somewhat augmented for the present occasion, and the rendering of the work vocally was generally excellent. Unfortunately, there was only an accompaniment of piano and harmonium, and therefore much of the instrumental effect and support was wanting, these instruments being, however, played with skill by Mr. Hall and Mr. Hopper. The solos were sung by Mrs. Taggart and Messrs. Riddell and Wallace. Mr. Jonathan Howell, choirmaster, conducted. The church was crowded.

The same Oratorio was performed, on the 18th ult., by the Kilmalcolm Musical Association, under the direction of Mr. W. Paterson Cross, of Greenock. The Concert was given in the United Presbyterian Church. The soloists were Mrs. Smith, Mr. W. Mackinnon, and Mr. T. Greenlees. The accompaniments were played by a small orchestra of strings, aided by a harmonium. The performance altogether was one of considerable excellence.

On the 16th ult. a Concert was given by the Glasgow Temperance Choral Society, in the Waterloo Rooms. W. M. Hutcheson's Cantata "Elaine" occupied the first part of the programme, and several part-songs and vocal solos followed. The Cantata, which was heard here for the first time, is tuneful, but superficial, and it cannot be said to have left any great impression, although presented with ability and care. Miss Gretchen Johnston, Miss J. N. Maclachlan, and Mr. William Young took respectively the soprano, contralto, and bass parts. The chorus numbered about 100 voices. Mr. W. H. Murray conducted.

A performance was given of William Hume's Cantata "Blind Bartimeus," by the choir of Langside Established Church, on the 17th ult., under the direction of Miss Kinghorn, who presided at the organ. Every justice was done to the new work, which it may be mentioned has been well taken up in Glasgow, this being its third or fourth performance here, with several others to follow, this season. It is becoming customary here to give services of praise on Sunday evenings, and on the Sunday night following the above Concert portions of the Cantata were repeated in the same church, in illustration of a Lecture on the subject of the Miracle, by the pastor of the congregation.

The Glasgow Select Choir gave its concluding Concert for the season in St. Andrew's Hall, on Saturday evening, the 19th ult. The programme was much of the usual cast, a quartet and chorus from Schumann's "Faust," "A noble ray," and a trio and chorus by the late Dr. Park of St. Andrew's, "A May song," with a Gaelic song and chorus, "Speed, bonnie boat," being perhaps the principal novelties. The singing of the choir was marked by the same excellences which have given them distinction here and elsewhere. In addition to the vocal music there were one or two chamber pieces by Mr. W. H. Cole's string quartet party, and two solos on the organ by Dr. A. L. Peace.

In Kinning Park Free Church, on the 22nd ult., the Musical Association gave a Concert of sacred and secular selections, all of a superior class, Mr. J. Hannay conducting. A Concert of Gaelic music, chiefly in part-song form, and in the original language, was given by the Gaelic Choir of St. Columba Established Church, in the Waterloo Rooms, on the same evening.

Miss Fanny Davies gave a Pianoforte Recital on Monday evening, the 21st ult., in the Queen's Rooms.

The Glasgow Corporation Saturday Afternoon Musical Recitals are maintained with considerable enterprise, and are excellently attended as a rule. On the 19th ult. the Dumbarton Choral Union, under the conductorship of Mr. James Mitchell, appeared and sang selections from "The Creation," to organ accompaniment by Mr. T. Berry; also some effective part-songs.

The third of Mr. W. H. Cole's Chamber Concerts took place on the 24th ult., in the St. Andrew's Berkeley Hall, and was well attended. The Rutherglen Choral Union, which is under the honorary conductorship of Mr. W. Macintyre, gave an excellent rendering of Cowen's "Rose Maiden," on the 25th ult., in the Burgh Hall.

MUSIC IN SOUTH WALES.

Very little of note has to be recorded for the month of March. Here and there Concerts have been held, but those of a high order were few and far between. Dodd's Saturday Concerts, at Cardiff, have been continued as before. The character of the performances generally speaking was kept at popular level, although the programmes were, perhaps, judiciously varied. The Concerts have not only been an acquisition to the new Park Hall, but a feature which has been a source of attraction to many of the local residents. On the 12th ult., there was a "humorous night," on which occasion Mr. A. G. Pritchard was the chief contributor to the mirth of the audience. The other vocalists were Miss Polly Jenkins, Mr. J. H. Zinck, and Mr. Dodd, who gave a typical song from the Tyneside (by Joe Wilson). Selections were played by the town band. On the 19th ult. the Concert organised by Mr. Dodd was very successful. The audience gave an enthusiastic reception to the violinist, Mr. Carrington, who responded to several encores. The vocalists were Miss S. C. Morris, Miss Florence Hassell, "Eos Wenallt," and Mr. W. H. Williams. It is proposed to conclude the season with a "special night" on the 16th inst.

"Come with torches" (Mendelssohn) is evidently becoming more and more popular as a test piece. It was heard to great advantage at the Crystal Palace fourteen years ago, when the Welsh Choir were "led to victory" by "Caradog." It will be heard, doubtless to advantage, in London again this year. I may also add that it is the subject for the chief choral competitions at Bridgend in June, and at Cardiff about the same time. The prize offered at Cardiff is £40. Here the Eisteddfod will be held in connection with the proposed National Institute of Wales. At Bridgend the prize will be £70 and a gold medal to the conductor, also £2 2s. to every unsuccessful conductor in the competition. Adjudicators: Mr. E. H. Turpin, London; and Mr. D. Jenkins, Aberystwith.

At last the South Wales Choral Union proposes giving a manifest token of its existence. The various sections have for some time past been practising Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and the united choir of 500 voices, under "Caradog," and assisted by some leading artists, will essay the rendering of the work at the Cardiff Park Hall, on the 20th inst. It may be stated, by way of explanation, that this Choral Union is a revival of the old Union which competed so successfully for Crystal Palace honours. It claims to have been established in 1873, but its operations have not continued unbroken. For some years the Union was not heard of, and it is only lately that measures have been taken to revive the semblance of its old self. "Caradog" is still able to assume the leadership, but many new vocalists will naturally be found in the choir. The Merthyr section, I hear, has retired. They were anxious, it appears, that the Union should have some great competition object in prospect, but I suppose the Conductor wants to "feel his way" first of all with his new material.

The performances by the Ebbw Vale Choral Society of "Judas Maccabæus," at the Market Hall, Ebbw Vale, on the 23rd ult., were well attended by the public. The choir was led by Mr. John Williams, and the artists were Miss M. J. Morewood (soprano), Miss S. Morewood (contralto), Eos Morlais (tenor), and Dr. Parry, Musical College (bass). The orchestra was furnished from Merthyr, and the accompanist was Mr. J. W. Wall. The proceeds will be devoted to the Restoration Fund of Libanus Chapel.

The forthcoming Eisteddfod at Pontypool is engrossing a great deal of attention in choral circles. The Dowlais choristers are preparing themselves for this occasion, as well as for the National Eisteddfod at London, which becomes very interesting as a topic of conversation as the time approaches for the great event. The prospect of having to compete with Metropolitan, Nottingham, and Hanley choirs is stimulating Welshmen to renewed efforts. They feel that a "day of reckoning" is coming in which it will not look well if they permit themselves to be beaten. With such choirs as those of Penrhyn (North Wales), Dowlais, and Llanelly, surely Wales may be expected to hold her own against all comers even in the city of the Saxons. A Swansea Choir is also in training for the leading choral competition, and Eisteddfod-goers may count upon a keen contest for musical honours in August.

On the 22nd ult., Mr. Rees Evans, Conductor of the Aberdare Choral Union, was presented by his friends with an illuminated address, in which his services were recognised in an appreciatory manner.

At Aberdare, on the 11th inst., there will be a brass band contest, for prizes of £8, £4, and £2. Mr. J. C. Bowden, Merthyr, has been appointed adjudicator, and the test piece will consist of a selection of Welsh airs.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, March 13.

The last month has been so crowded with interesting musical occurrences that it will be impossible to look beyond the metropolis in this retrospect. The German Opera has come to an end; the season of English Opera, or Opera in English, by the National Opera Company, has begun; Herr Anton Seidl has been called from the musical directorship of the Metropolitan Institution to the post of Kapellmeister at the Court Opera at Berlin; Berlioz's opera "The Trojans in Carthage," has been given in concert form for the first time in America; "Ruddigore" has been introduced to our public; the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given two Concerts in New York; Rubinstein's "Paradise Lost" has been performed by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, for the first time in its entirety in the United States; and the same composer's "Nero" has been got ready for performance by the National Opera Company.

This, then, is the budget which I am called on to discuss with appropriate brevity. The German Opera closed its doors on February 26, after a season of fifteen weeks, in which the degree of success—artistic as well as financial—attained was greater than ever before. Sixty-one representations of fourteen operas were given, and of the sixty-one representations thirty-one were devoted to Wagner. The receipts from the public (exclusive of the assessment on the stockholders for the use of their boxes) were about 200,000 dollars. The assessment swells the receipts to about 380,000 dollars, which is about 75,000 dollars more than came in during the season 1885-86. The names of the operas, the order in which they were produced, and their relative popularity, can be learned from the following table, from which occupants of stockholders' boxes are excluded:—

Opera.	Date of first performance.	Times given.	Average attendance.
Queen of Sheba	November 8	4	2,479
Die Walküre	November 10	3	2,465
Aïda	November 12	4	2,212
Prophet	November 17	5	2,747
Golden Cross and Ballet	November 19	4	2,087
Tannhäuser	November 26	6	2,795
Tristan und Isolde	December 1	8	2,783
Faust	December 8	3	2,395
Lohengrin	December 15	4	2,822
Merlin	January 3	5	2,460
Fidelio	January 14	3	2,879
Meistersinger	January 21	5	2,560
Rienzi	January 31	5	2,600
Masaniello	February 16	2	2,822

I leave it to the reader to draw what lessons he can from such a showing. Some of the most striking features of the season were discussed from time to time in this place, such as the extraordinary success of "Tristan" and "Fidelio," after they had been put upon the list in deference to the requests of Herr Seidl, the artists, and the critics, the majority of whom have a Wagnerian bent, and have enjoyed the pleasure during the whole season of leading the public along the paths which were mutually delightful. One significant fact, however, remains to be mentioned. It is this: The Wagnerian tide ran so strongly all the season as to disarrange all the plans of the manager. "Tristan und Isolde" and "Tannhäuser," which cost the least to put on the stage, brought in the most money. "Aïda," on the mise en scène of which the management expended no less than £6,000, was a flat failure, partly because of the inability of the tenor engaged for the title-rôle, Herr Zobel (who was not permitted to sing after the opera was withdrawn, and cost the institution 2,000 dollars a night, he receiving 8,000 dollars for the season's work), and partly because of the indifference of the public to the opera. The management also made a disastrous experiment with ballet. Last summer Director Stanton bought two ballets in Germany, "Vienna Waltzes" and Hellmesberger's "Fata Morgana." The stockholders were much interested in this form of entertainment, and evidently thought the public would be as well. But the public cared nothing about the tableaux and the dancing, and Mr. Stanton wisely withdrew the "Vienna Waltzes" after four trials, and did not take the trouble to mount the "Fata Morgana." In place of these additional performances of "Tristan und Isolde" were given.

The popular enthusiasm over the German season was so great that Herr Seidl's Concerts were turned into Oratorios for him. The news that he had accepted a call to Berlin caused great disappointment, and was looked upon for a while in the light of a rebuke to the management of the Metropolitan Opera House in not securing him betimes. The desire to have him back at all hazards is so great, that though there has been some telegraphic correspondence with Herr Mottl and Herr Sucher of Hamburg, no definite plan has been made, the directors still hoping that Herr Seidl, who is now in Berlin, will find the new post not altogether to his liking, and will yet be persuaded to return. As to the plans of the establishment for next season I can do no better than to quote a few words from an authorised statement by Director Stanton:—

"The public's appetite, in this instance at least, is decidedly growing by what it feeds on, and until there is a change in the public's taste German opera will be continued year after year at the Metropolitan Opera House. Next season it is proposed to bring out the third and fourth parts of the "Nibelungen Ring," and possibly Weber's "Euryanthe," as well as one of Gluck's operas, "Alceste," perhaps. It is possible also that Herr Niemann, if he can succeed in obtaining the necessary furlough, will be re-engaged. Fräulein Brandt, Herr Fischer, Herr Robinson, and Herr Alvary will return. Fräulein Lehmann wishes to look after her Berlin affairs before binding herself to come back here next year. I sincerely hope that there will be no obstacle, for Fräulein Lehmann is decidedly the best all-round operatic artist now before the public. Herr Seidl's departure leaves a great void, of course. There is no one, I can assure you, we would rather have here as conductor than him. If anything can be done with the Berlin authorities to obtain his release I shall do it. At all events, I shall engage no one to take his place until I see that he is unalterably resolved to stay in the German capital."

The five weeks' season of the National Opera Company at the Metropolitan began on February 28. Thus far it has not been a success financially, and it is evident that Rubinstein's "Nero" is looked upon as its possible salvation. Unfortunately for these prospects, however, there has already been one postponement for causes which excite a suspicion that there will have to be another. Now it is set down for Monday, March 14. The list of operas given thus far is the same as that during the Brooklyn engagement, of which an account has already been furnished.

The performance of "The Trojans in Carthage," by Berlioz, unfortunately fell upon a night after the severest snow and rain storm of a quarter of a century had made the streets all but impassable. The result was that the work was heard by only about 300 persons; but its reception was so enthusiastic that Mr. Van der Stucken at once resolved to repeat the performance. The opera, which had such a melancholy fate in Paris, was prepared for performance as a dramatic Cantata by H. E. Krehbiel, and was found to accept the new dress very gracefully. It contains numbers which must be ranked among the finest of Berlioz's inspirations. Without exception the critics welcomed it as a work much worthier of frequent performance than "The Damnation of Faust," which had an extraordinary run in New York seven years ago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concerts were entirely successful, and furnished an opportunity for the pen and public of New York to demonstrate that they are in no manner jealous of the advance which Boston has made in the department of instrumental music. The band is magnificently endowed in the matter of strings, but the wind department does not bear comparison with the New York orchestras. The training of Herr Gericke has produced a marvellous precision and elasticity of ensemble, and the readings of standard works is intelligent and sympathetic, if not very profound or virile. Concerning the production of Rubinstein's "Paradise Lost," I have not time to say more than that it took place last night, under the direction of Theodore Thomas, and that the choral portions of the work were much admired. The same remark might apply to Liszt's "Christus," which had its first complete American performance under the direction of Walter J. Damrosch, at a Concert of the Oratorio Society, on March 3.

OBITUARY.

Edward Hecht.—By the premature death, in his 55th year, of Mr. Edward Hecht, on the 6th ult., musical society in Lancashire and Yorkshire has sustained a severe loss. In Manchester especially, where he had been settled for nearly thirty-three years, and where, after Mr. Hallé, he was perhaps the most notable figure in musical circles, it is difficult to imagine how the gap will be filled.

Edward Hecht, born in November, 1832, at Dürkheim on the Haardt, in Rhenish Bavaria, was the son of a professor of singing and excellent musician, established at Frankfort-on the-Maine. After completing a thorough course of musical studies, under several distinguished masters—in particular Rosenhain—he quitted his native land, and after a short stay in London took up his residence in Manchester in 1854, as a teacher of the pianoforte, being determined in his choice of that city by domestic reasons, a married sister having already settled there. It was not long before his solid qualities brought him to the front. In 1859 he became conductor of the Manchester "Liedertafel" or German male choir, a post which he retained until 1878. In 1860 he became connected with the St. Cecilia Amateur Choral Society, of which more anon. On the retirement of Mr. C. A. Seymour he became the sub-conductor of Mr. Hallé's concerts in the Free Trade Hall, and for the last seventeen years fulfilled the duties of chorus-master in connection with the same series with an intelligence and efficiency which secured the happiest results. No matter how difficult the work to be performed, the rendering of the choral parts was awaited with the same security and confidence that long experience had taught one to repose in Mr. Hallé's orchestra. Furthermore, on the occasions—rare until the present season—when Mr. Hallé was incapacitated from conducting, Mr. Hecht proved himself a thoroughly competent substitute. The present writer well remembers how, on one occasion, he undertook and carried through at the eleventh hour a most excellent rendering of so exacting a work as Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique, while the unanimous applause from chorus, orchestra, and all parts of the house which greeted his appearances in this capacity testified as fully to his personal popularity as to his artistic merit. As a pianist, he was well known and appreciated by Manchester audiences, excelling in particular in his interpretation of Schumann, but always displaying taste and thoroughness. Besides the above-mentioned duties, Mr. Hecht fulfilled those of conductor to the Stretford Choral Society and two Yorkshire Choral Associations—the Bradford St. Cecilia and the Halifax Choral Societies—and had just been appointed conductor of the Bradford Festival. He succeeded Dr. Bridge—on the latter's appointment to Westminster—as lecturer on harmony and composition at the Owens College (where he had latterly established an Orchestral Society), and was musical examiner at the High School for Girls at Manchester and Leeds. Finally, as a pianoforte teacher, Mr. Hecht had a select clientèle and a deservedly high reputation.

Just as Mr. Hallé is heard and seen to the greatest advantage, whether as conductor or executant, at his concerts in the Free Trade Hall, so Mr. Hecht always seemed to us to be most thoroughly in his element at the rehearsals or concerts of the St. Cecilia Society. During several years' residence in Manchester the present writer had the privilege of attending the meetings of this Society, and no lapse of time will wipe out the recollection of the deep debt of gratitude that he owes to its late conductor in introducing him to some of the most delightful music of all ages. During the years in question the works performed by the Society included—for the list is not exhaustive—the following compositions:—Selections from Handel's "Solomon" and Mozart's "Idomeneo"; Bach's Cantata "God's time is the best"; Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," "Adventlied," "Pilgrimage of the Rose," and "Luck of Edenhall"; Stanford's 46th Psalm and Brahms's "Deutsches Requiem."

The foregoing catalogue of Mr. Hecht's multifarious duties, formidable as it was, did not, however, exhaust the sum total of his activities, for he found time in the intervals of his well-earned leisure to turn his scholarly attainments to good account in the field of composition, the list of his original works embracing a Symphony and a Cantata ("Eric the Dane"), performed at Mr. Hallé's Concerts in 1877 and 1882 respectively. Here we may incidentally remark that the admirable way in which Mr. Hallé's choir worked at and performed the very difficult and trying choruses in the former work, afforded the best proof of their devotion to the composer. He also wrote a setting for chorus and orchestra of "The Charge of the Light Brigade," composed for the Bristol Festival, 1879; a setting for chorus of George Eliot's lines "O may I join the choir invisible"; a string quartet, recently performed at the Manchester Classical Chamber Concerts, besides several part-songs, songs, and pianoforte pieces. This is not the place to enter upon any discussion of the merits of these works, and we will confine ourselves to observing, first, that they all bear the impress of a thoughtful intelligence; and, secondly, that in the choice of words for musical illustration Mr. Hecht set an excellent example to less fastidious brother composers.

Before concluding this necessarily imperfect tribute to the memory of an admirable musician and a good man, we should like to amplify and, it may be, correct the impression which the foregoing remarks may have conveyed to our readers by recording a few of his characteristic traits. Like many another earnest artist, he fully appreciated the sweetness of desipere in loco. No one was fonder of a joke in due season. A genial host, with no scanty store of anecdote to draw on, he excelled in driving home his meaning by some pithy or quaint expression. The end of his active and honourable life has been in thorough keeping with its general character of unbroken vigour, for he may be said to have practically died in harness, having been taken ill, after a rehearsal, with the complaint—inflammation of the lungs—which carried him off in less than a week. It would have been hard to associate his robust individuality with a gradual failure of vitality. His sudden removal was, in a way, a more fitting termination, though it renders it all the harder for his many friends to realise that they will never again hear his hearty laugh or be cheered by the bracing influence of his presence.

James Broughton.—We regret to announce the death at Leeds, in his fifty-fourth year, of this well-known Yorkshire musician. Born near Dewsbury, Mr. Broughton migrated to Leeds when thirteen years of age. Even then he was a promising organist, and his appointment to a church became merely a question of time. His first post was at the Roman Catholic Church of St. Ann, where he conducted the musical services for more than twenty years. On leaving, Mr. Broughton became Organist at the Grammar School, and discharged the duties of that office during fifteen years—as long, in fact, as health permitted. Meanwhile, his unquestionable talent brought him plenty of professional engagements. He was connected at different time swith various local musical organisations, including the Leeds Philharmonic Society, the Bradford Festival Chorus, and other bodies, and few people who attended them will have forgotten the delightful Chamber Concerts which he gave over a period of ten years at the Queen's Hotel. He obtained his chief fame, however, as chorus-master of the Leeds Triennial Musical Festivals from 1874 to 1883. Shortly after the Festival of 1883, Mr. Broughton's health began to fail, and he travelled to a warmer clime, returning in July last year with no permanent improvement. He died at his house in Leeds on the 12th ult. Mr. Broughton was an enthusiastic collector of objects of art and curios, and those who have visited him will well remember the museum-like aspect of his residence. The funeral, which took place on the 16th ult., was remarkable for the abundance of its music, both in the church and at the grave side, where chorals were performed by a quartet of brass instruments—one cornet and three trombones.

A very successful Pianoforte Recital was given by Mr. Charles Stewart Macpherson at the Assembly Rooms, Streatham Common, on the 1st ult. The programme included Beethoven's "Sonata quasi una Fantasia" in C sharp minor (Moonlight); Chopin's "Berceuse and Ballade" in A flat; Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," Nos. 1 and 34; Schumann's "Novellette" in E; besides examples from the works of Handel, Weber, Sterndale Bennett, Grieg, Henselt, and Walter Macfarren. Miss Blanche Murray sang two Scotch Ballads (C. S. Macpherson), and songs by Goring Thomas, Cowen, and Maude Valérie White. Mr. Herbert Lake acted as accompanist.

The Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "St. Paul," on the 2nd ult., at St. Clement's Church, Notting Hill. The soloists were Miss Douglas-Hamilton, Miss Ellen Cooper, Mr. Ager Grover, and Mr. Henry Cross. A second performance of the Oratorio was given, on the 16th ult., at Holy Trinity Church, Islington. The soloists were Mrs. L'Estrange, Miss Ellen Cooper, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. James Blackney. A performance of "Elijah" was given in the Congregational Church, Tolmers Square, on the 23rd ult. The soloists were Miss Annie Daymond, Mrs. Oram, Mr. Ager Grover, and Mr. Jabez West. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ on each occasion.

At St. Margaret Pattens, Rood Lane, the energetic attempt to produce six different Oratorio performances in as many weeks has testified, by the large and attentive congregations which have been drawn together, to the growing popularity of this class of service, and to the usefulness of this method of familiarising the public with the works of the great masters. On Wednesday evenings during the Lenten season, Gounod's "De Profundis," "Gallia," and the first part of the "Redemption," Spohr's "Calvary," parts one and two (divided), the "Passion" music from Handel's "Messiah," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" have been performed with the greatest pains and care by the unaided choir of the church, with organ accompaniment only, by Mr. Horace Buttery, the Director of Music. Stainer's new Cantata, "The Crucifixion," will be given on Sunday, the 3rd inst. It should be mentioned that these Oratorio services are continued at intervals throughout the year, both on Sunday and week-day evenings. At Easter, the second and third parts of the "Messiah" will be performed, and later the remaining portions of Gounod's "Redemption."

The excellent performances of Gounod's "Mors et Vita" (Parts I. and III.), with orchestra, organ, and harp, at St. Stephen's, South Kensington, on Fridays in Lent, have up to the present time well exemplified the eminent suitableness of this work for church use, especially in the penitential seasons. This is the first occasion of the composition being rendered in church with orchestra. The well trained choir of St. Stephen's has been slightly augmented for the work, and the solos and quartets are sung by members of the choir, viz.—Master Warwick Major, Master Archibald Frazer, Mr. Frederick Cundy, and Mr. Broughton Black, most noticeable being the attack and expression of the solo and chorus singing. For the Postlude, Gounod's "Marche Solennelle" is performed by the band. Mr. Warren Tear plays the organ and Mr. John Cheshire the harp, the Conductor being Mr. Hamilton Robinson, the Organist and Choirmaster of St. Stephen's.

A Concert, under the direction of Mr. Walter Stark, the Music Master, was given by the First School Choir of Archbishop Tenison's Grammar School, Leicester Square, assisted by a few ladies and gentlemen, in the large hall, on the 3rd ult. The first part consisted of a new sacred Cantata by Mr. Edmund Rogers, entitled "Footprints of the Saviour." The work is arranged in four parts, dealing with the Childhood of Christ, His Ministry on Earth, His Passion and Death, His Resurrection and Ascension. The principal vocalists were Miss Florence Thompson, Miss Maud Laister, Mr. Edwin Smith, and Mr. R. Poole. Both the solo and choral portions were excellently rendered, and the composer, who conducted the Cantata, was called forward at the conclusion of the performance and warmly applauded. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, one of the chief items being a pianoforte solo by Mr. Walter Stark.

A Smoking Concert, in aid of the Indigent Jews' Benevolent Society, was given by the Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society, at Princes' Hall, on the 5th ult. Several orchestral pieces were performed under the direction of Mr. Norfolk Megone with considerable effect. Violin solos were ably contributed by Mr. Pollitzer, and Mr. Bottesini created genuine enthusiasm by his wonderful performance on the double bass. Mr. Charles Chilley was the vocalist and did double duty, Mr. Henschel, who was to have sung, being absent through indisposition. Much amusement was created by the humorous recitation of the "Charity Dinner" given by Mr. Charles Fry. H.S.H. the Duke of Teck was present at the Concert.

Mr. G. Augustus Holmes, Organist of St. George's, Camberwell, gave his annual Concert at the Surrey Masonic Hall, on February 28. An excellent programme was well rendered by Miss Meredyth Elliott, Miss Helen Haldane, R.A.M., Miss Meta Russell, Mr. Carli Zoeller, Mr. Joseph Heald, R.A.M., Mr. H. A. Chapman, Mr. James Budd, Mr. Seymour Smith, and Mr. Wallace Briggs. Mr. Holmes gave a brilliant performance of "Polka de la Reine" (Raff), also playing duets with his pupils Miss Worrell and Master Aldersley; his "Colonial and Indian March" was well rendered by an efficient orchestra. Mr. Thomas Phisick was an able accompanist.

The Annual Concert of the Violin Classes at the Birkbeck Institute, under the direction of Mr. W. Fitzhenry, took place on the evening of the 11th ult. The members of the classes were successful in their rendering of a String Quartet by Tolhurst and a Quintet by Jarvis, but the feature of the evening was the playing of Handel's "Largo," with accompaniment of pianoforte and Mustel organ. This was received with much enthusiasm. Mr. T. E. Gatehouse's violin solos elicited the usual encore. The vocalists—Miss Mary Beare, Mr. Orlando Harley, and Mr. F. Bevan—contributed songs, Mr. John Beare played a flute solo, and Mr. H. M. Higgs a solo on the Mustel organ. Mr. Charles Fry greatly pleased the audience by his spirited recital of Lord Tennyson's "The Revenge," and a humorous piece "The lost thread," by W. A. Barrett. Mrs. W. Fitzhenry, Mr. P. A. Hawkins, and Mr. C. S. Macpherson did good service at the pianoforte.

On Tuesday, the 8th ult., the Shepherd's Bush and Hammersmith Sacred Choral Union gave, at its second Concert, a performance of Handel's "Messiah," at Oaklands Chapel, Uxbridge Road. The soloists were Miss Pushman, Miss F. Slater, Mr. C. T. Grimsdick, and Mr. John Ridding, all of whom acquitted themselves admirably, the last-named especially distinguishing himself by his spirited and excellent rendering of "Why do the nations" and "The trumpet shall sound." The instrumentalists were—Piano, Miss Millen; harmonium, Mr. Ellison; organ Mr. A. Stride; and Mr. C. G. Bell, Conductor. A small string band, led by Mr. Humphreys, played the accompaniments with much effect. The choruses were sung with steadiness and precision, and the efforts of all concerned gave much satisfaction to the audience.

The second Subscription Concert of the St. John's (Lewisham) Choral Society was given on February 24. The first part of the programme consisted of Gaul's "Holy City." The second part was miscellaneous, and included Mendelssohn's "Deep repose of night" and "I waited for the Lord," Smart's "Ave Maria," Leslie's "Pilgrims," and Professor Pole's Motett "The Hundredth Psalm." The principal vocalists were Miss Simson, Miss Cassells, Miss J. Wilson, Miss Schmidt, Miss L. Pyne, Mr. E. Harris, Mr. P. H. Fulkes, Mr. F. A. Bridge, and Mr. Duckworth. Mr. Walter and Mr. E. Samson played a Duet for flute and pianoforte by Hauptmann, the latter gentleman also contributing Mendelssohn's "Rondo Brillant" in B minor. Mr. Henry A. Toase presided at the pianoforte, Mr. E. Samson at the harmonium, and Mr. F. A. Bridge conducted.

The Plymouth Vocal Association gave a performance of Gounod's "Mors et Vita" at the Guildhall, on Thursday, the 24th ult. The rendering of the work (heard on this occasion for the first time in Plymouth) was in every respect satisfactory, and reflected the utmost credit on Mr. F. N. Löhr, the Conductor, who had evidently expended great labour on the training of the choir. The choruses were all well sung, special mention being due to that which ends the work, "Hosanna in excelsis," which was so impressively given that the audience rose to their feet. The soloists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. F. King, whose rendering of their respective parts is too well known to need comment. Mr. Pardew led the orchestra, and Mr. Faull presided at the organ. Mr. Löhr conducted with his usual ability.

Madame Edith Gordon-Bartlett gave an evening Concert, on the 7th ult., at the Gresham Hall, Brixton, before a large audience. Madame Gordon-Bartlett, whose reception was most flattering, was assisted by Madame Enriquez, Mr. Donnell Balfe, the bénéficiaire's pupil, Miss May Nolan, Miss Helen Dalton, and Mr. Walter Haslem, vocalists. Mr. Arthur Payne displayed great ability in his violin performances; pianoforte solos by Mr. Arthur L'Estrange were brilliantly played, and the harp solo, by Miss Chatterton, was much appreciated. Mr. John Harrison accompanied.

Clergymen and Choirmasters who propose holding Services in celebration of the forthcoming Jubilee, will be glad to know that the Responses proper for the Service, can be found in "Daily Service and Litany," edited by the Rev. S. Flood Jones and Dr. J. F. Bridge, and published by Novello, Ewer & Co.

On Friday evening, the 25th ult., the first Smoking Concert of the Electro-Harmonic Society, which has been formed for the purpose of social intercourse amongst the electrical fraternity, took place in the Banquet Room, St. James's Hall Restaurant, under the presidency of Mr. C. E. Spagnoletti, C.E. A most enjoyable evening was spent, and a capital programme carried out by Messrs. Bevan, Dalzell, Brown, and Kift, with Mr. T. E. Gatehouse (solo violin); Mr. Wilhelm Ganz, who most kindly offered his valuable services, and played Beethoven's "Sonata Pathétique"; and Mr. Alfred Izard as accompanist. This Society, which numbers amongst its members many of the most eminent scientists in this country, should eventually occupy a high position amongst kindred institutions.

A series of five Drawing-room Subscription Concerts, under the direction of Mr. H. E. Button, have been given in the Bijou Hall, adjoining the Finchley Road Station, during February and March. The programmes have chiefly consisted of glees, madrigals, and part-songs for men's voices, varied by a selection of those requiring boys' voices. The singers have been Messrs. W. Coward, H. E. Button, Albert James, E. Dalzell, A. Thompson, H. Parkin, H. Horscroft, and W. G. Forington, solos having been also contributed by most of the above-named artists. Instrumental solos by Miss Anna Lang and Mr. H. E. Button (violin), Mr. C. H. Allen Gill (violoncello), and Mr. A. Izard (pianoforte) have also been included in the programmes.

The United Richard Wagner Society announces a Conversazione to be held in June next, on which occasion Dr. Hans Richter has consented to conduct the "Siegfried Idyll." A choir chosen from the German Choral Societies and a ladies' chorus will perform selections from Wagner's dramas. Mr. Walter Bache and several other eminent artists have also promised their assistance. In furtherance of the Wagner movement, it is proposed to start a quarterly publication. As it is impossible to support it by the funds of the Society, however, a small extra subscription will have to be raised; and considering that only one hundred subscribers of 4s. each will be sufficient for the purpose, there can be little doubt that this fund will speedily be forthcoming.

The members of the St. Columba's Choral Society gave their first Concert in the Hall of St. Columba (Church of Scotland), Pont Street, on Wednesday evening, the 2nd ult. The chief item was Macfarren's Cantata "May Day," which was very fairly given under the direction of Mr. John Lowe, Conductor of the Society, and Organist, &c., of the church. The accompaniments were played by Mrs. Dunhill (pianoforte), and Mr. Karl Hahn (American organ). The rest of the programme was miscellaneous; including, in addition to part-songs and glees, ballads sung by Miss Adelaide Mullen (who also gave with much effect the soprano solo in the Cantata), and Mr. J. Dalgety Henderson, and instrumental solos by Mr. Guy Wetherall and Mr. Karl Hahn.

A Concert was given at the Regent's Park Chapel, on Wednesday, the 2nd ult., in aid of the fund of the Domestic Mission. Miss Mary Davies gave with much effect Handel's recitative "Blest be the power" and air "O had I Jubal's lyre"; Miss Damian gained much applause by her rendering of Beethoven's Creation's Hymn; and Miss Margaret Hoare was very successful in "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Songs were also given by Messrs. Hulbert Fulkerson, H. B. Grove, and Alfred Moore. Miss Clara Titterton contributed two violin solos, Andante and Capriccio by David, and Cavatina by Raff, and Miss Frances Thomas gave clarinet solos by Gade and Reyloff. Mr. J. L. Phillips presided at the organ and Mr. Ernest Kiver at the pianoforte.

At Holy Trinity Church, Stroud Green, on the 16th, 23rd, and 30th ult., performances were given of Bach's "Passion" (St. John) with orchestra and choir numbering about fifty. The solos were sung by Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Marie Middleton, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Robert Hilton. Mr. H. J. Dean ably presided at the organ, and the Rev. Willoughby Carter conducted with care and judgment. The congregations have been large on each occasion.

The West Kensington Choral Society gave a Concert at the May Street Schoolroom, on the 8th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. E. Pettman, A.C.O. The programme was highly interesting, the principal items consisting of Handel's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day" and Schumann's "Gipsy Life," the soloists in the first work being Mrs. Edwardes and Mr. Collwyn Thomas, and in the second Miss Downes, Miss C. MacHutchin, Mr. McLaren, and the Rev. P. S. Propert. Both compositions were well rendered. Vocal pieces were successfully given (one called "Sunset," written especially for the Concert by the Conductor), Miss Fountain being encored in her song, and Mr. Pettman receiving a like compliment for his performance of a Study by Chopin.

Miss Tombleson gave her first annual Concert at the Lecture Hall, New Southgate, on the 17th ult. The vocalists were Miss Liddell (who replaced Miss Webster and whose efforts were much applauded), Mr. W. T. Upton, Mr. W. Bennett, Mr. Charles O'Neill, and the Concert-giver, who received a hearty encore for her rendering of Sullivan's "Guinevere." Violin solos were contributed by Mr. W. A. Robins, and Miss Louisa Pyne played Raff's "La Fileuse" and Rubinstein's "Le bal" with much effect. During the evening, Mr. Charles Fry recited a scene from the "Merchant of Venice" and also gave the "Charity Dinner" with much humour.

The members of the Grosvenor Choral Society held their 181st monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, on Friday evening, the 18th ult., when a selection of sacred music, including Spohr's Cantata "God, Thou art great," was given. The soloists were Miss Ada Beck, who sang the solo in Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" with good taste and feeling; Miss Gibbs, Miss Roberts, and Miss Bond, Mr. T. P. Frame, and Mr. Frank May. Mr. Tonking gave a violin solo and accompanied the Cantata on the Mustel organ. Mr. C. M. Gibson and Mr. T. P. Frame accompanied. Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

Mr. John Farmer's "Christ and His Soldiers" was given at a Special Service in St. Andrew Undershaft, Leadenhall Street, on Tuesday evening, the 8th ult., by an augmented choir, with organ and orchestral accompaniment, numbering together over one hundred performers. The solos were well rendered by members of St. Andrew's choir, and the choruses given with much precision by the combined forces. Mr. W. J. Winter (Assistant Organist at Westminster Abbey) presided at the organ, and Mr. W. M. Wait (Organist and Choirmaster, St. Andrew Undershaft) conducted.

A strange story is going about to the effect that Verdi has another opera on the subject of "Otello," that it is called "Iago," and written in the style of his earlier works. Nothing could be more improbable. The actual "Otello," for years past, occupied all the time the old master had to spare from the duties of his congenial country life. He had come to love his work, to delight in taking counsel with himself about it, and in slowly shaping its perfection. His remark to a friend in Milan was that he felt a kind of regret in parting with the close companion of years, and throwing it upon the tender mercies of the world.

We have much pleasure in drawing attention to the claims of the "Quarterly Musical Review," published in Manchester and London, and edited by Dr. Hiles. We regret that we cannot transfer to our columns some extracts from the many ably written articles which have appeared from time to time in this journal, but as specimens of their quality, we may mention "Music and Municipalities," by J. F. Youngman; "The case of the Organist," by A. L. Smith, Mus. B.; and "Aspects and Prospects of Music in England," by Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, which appear in the number for February last.

The programmes of the five Symphony Concerts of the Philharmonic Orchestra at Baltimore, under the direction of Mr. W. E. Heimendahl, are uniformly excellent, high class music, both of the past and present day, being very fairly represented. The pianists announced are Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. S. B. Mills, Mr. Richard Burmeister, and Mr. Harold Randolph, and the vocalists Miss Emily Winant and Mrs. R. Ortmann.

The members of the Forest Gate Choral Society gave a Sacred Concert in the Forest Gate Congregational Church, on the 10th ult. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and "Hear my Prayer," Beethoven's "Hallelujah," and other selections, all of which were well rendered. The solos were taken by Miss Effie Chapuy, Miss L. H. Lawrence, Miss Nellie Porter, Miss E. C. Blyth, Mr. William Price, and Mr. E. W. Giles. The accompaniments were played by Miss L. H. Lawrence (pianoforte) and Mr. Duncan Callow (organ). Mr. J. B. Mellis conducted.

Mendelssohn's "Athalie" was performed at Union Chapel, Islington, under the direction of Mr. R. Williamson, on the 2nd ult. The solo vocalists were Miss Thornthwaite, Miss Evelyn Gibson, and Madame Marian McKenzie, whose fine voice was heard to considerable advantage in the contralto music. Mr. Charles Fry recited the illustrative scenes with much dramatic power. The choruses were fairly rendered by the members of the Psalmody Class, and Mr. FountainMeen accompanied throughout on the fine organ of the chapel with rare skill and judgment.

The Fifty-first Smoking Concert of the South London Musical Club was given at the Gresham Hall, Brixton, on the 15th ult. The programme comprised an excellent selection of glees and choruses, including the South London Musical Club Prize Glee "A message to Phyllis" (Gerard F. Cobb). Mr. Henry Yates sang "Thou art so near" (Reichardt) in an artistic manner, and Mr. G. T. Miles played four solos on the harp (two being in response to encores). Mr. Charles Stevens (Musical Director) conducted, and Mr. E. W. Brewster accompanied.

An excellent Concert was given by the West London Male Voice Union, at the Athenæum, Shepherd's Bush, on the 2nd ult. Several well-known part-songs were rendered with much effect, and also a glee, "To the rose," composed by the Conductor, Mr. Albert Reakes. Songs were given by Miss Louise Phillips, Miss Lily Rowe, Mr. Edwin Bryant, and Mr. Albert Reakes, and violin and violoncello performances by Mr. Victor Buzian and Mr. Giuseppe Dinelli agreeably diversified the programme. Mr. Albert Reakes conducted.

A Concert was given by Madame Woodhatch, at the May Street Schoolrooms, on the 21st ult., in aid of the funds of St. Andrew's, Fulham. The soloists were Madame Woodhatch, Miss Nellie Jones, Miss Maud Harding, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. John W. Knott, all of whom acquitted themselves to the satisfaction of the audience, while agreeable variety was afforded to the programme by the excellent part-singing of the Mendelssohn Quartette. Mr. E. Pettman accompanied the soloists, and also played two pianoforte solos.

Mr. Frank Austin, L.Mus., T.C.L., gave a Concert at Wellington Hall, Islington, on the 10th ult., at which songs of his own composition were performed. The most favourably received items were "The Skipper's Farewell," sung by Mr. Thomas Kempton; a "Gipsy Song," Miss Alice White; "Anita," Mr. A. Probert; and an "Echo" song (composed in canon for two soprani), all of which were encored. The composer accompanied throughout, and played short selections from Beethoven, Henselt, Chopin, Bennett, and Rubinstein.

On Wednesday, the 9th ult., a Concert was given at Paddington Terminus, in aid of the Widows and Orphans of the Great Western Railway Company's employés. The vocalists were Miss Marie de Lido, Miss Minnie Laurie, Master T. Burt, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. Arthur Griffiths, Mr. Albert Reakes, and Mr. Joseph Longman. Solos on the violin were given by Mr. Percy Webster, and on the pianoforte by Mr. François E. Choveaux, who was also the accompanist. The Temperance Choir, under the direction of Mr. W. J. T. Cox, sang several part-songs very effectively.

A Concert was given on the 23rd ult., at the Primitive Methodist Chapel, Caledonian Road, by the choir, assisted by a small string band. The performance consisted of Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm and selections from the works of Handel, Mozart, &c. Mr. C. W. Setchfield (Organist of the Chapel) conducted, and Mr. Fred. W. Howland accompanied on the pianoforte.

A Concert, under the direction of Mr. Eade Montefiore, was given on Thursday, the 3rd ult., at 13, Belgrave Square, by kind permission of the Earl and Countess Beauchamp. Mr. Brandon Thomas, Mr. E. Watts-Russell, and Mr. A. Page-Cookes gave recitations; the musical portion of the programme being ably sustained by La Comtesse de Brémont, Miss Sara Wells, Mrs. Gregory Hast, Mr. Charles Ackerman, Mr. T. Maude, Mr. James Blackney, and Mr. Gregory Hast.

An Organ Recital was given, on the 9th ult., at St. Andrew's, Ashley Place, Victoria Street, by Mr. H. W. Weston, F.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster of Balham Parish Church. His masterly rendering of selections from Bach, Massenet, Merkel, Guilmant, and Silas was greatly appreciated by a large congregation. On Good Friday evening, Dr. Stainer's new Sacred Cantata "The Crucifixion" will be sung by the choir, Dr. C. Pearce presiding at the organ.

The North-East London Choral Society gave the second Concert of the present season at the Morley Hall, Hackney, on the 9th ult., the programme consisting of C. H. Lloyd's "Andromeda" and a short miscellaneous selection. The solo vocalists were Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Rose Dafforne, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. F. A. Bridge; solo violin, Mr. Arthur Payne; pianoforte, Mr. Fountain Meen; harmonium, Mr. L. B. Prout; Conductor, Mr. John E. West. The music was excellently rendered.

A performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," followed by a miscellaneous selection, was given in Craven Hill Congregational Church, Lancaster Gate, on Thursday, the 3rd ult. There was a full orchestra of fifty performers (the Bayswater Orchestral Society) and a choir of seventy-five voices. The solo vocalists were Miss Adelaide Mullen, Miss Rose Dafforne, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. T. R. Croger. Mr. Harkness Lait conducted, and Mr. Fred. W. Noakes (Organist of the Church) presided at the organ.

The question of a diapason normal is now being discussed in Italian musical journals. This irrepressible subject goes the round of Europe continually, but can hardly be due here for some time to come. We have not yet forgotten a meeting at St. James's Hall; the appointment of a Committee to lower our pitch; and the lame and impotent, as well as speedy, conclusion of the whole matter.

A special Service was held on the 17th ult., at All Saints' Church, Child's Hill, when Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm was sung by the members of the St. Peter's Choral Society (Cricklewood), under the able directorship of Mr. A. A. Yeatman, F.C.O., Organist of Finchley Parish Church. During the service the following pieces were effectively rendered on the organ by Mr. Yeatman: Andante (Guilmant), Andante in G (Smart), and March in D (Smart).

The Hatcham Park Musical Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. Frederick A. Jewson, gave a Concert on February 24, before a large audience. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise"—the solos by Miss Ada Patterson, Mrs. Bindloss, and Mr. James Sprunt—was excellently rendered; and a miscellaneous second part—which included violin solos by Madame Dunbar Perkins—was highly successful.

Mr. G. Augustus Holmes, Organist of St. George's, Camberwell, gave his usual monthly free Organ Recital, in the church, on the 20th ult. The programme, which was rendered with skill and precision, consisted of Mendelssohn's second Sonata, Andante in G and Offertoire in E flat (Batiste), March Funèbre and Chant Séraphique (Guilmant), Air and Variations (Beethoven), and March from "Joshua" (Seymour Smith).

We are able to state that Mr. Augustus Harris has engaged Mr. Mancinelli (composer of the Oratorio "Isaiah" to be produced at Norwich next autumn) as Conductor of the Italian Opera season at Drury Lane. Mr. Mancinelli is now filling a similar post at the Royal Theatre, Madrid.

Mr. Alfred Physick (Organist and Director of the Choir of Holy Trinity, Upper Tooting) gave the Organ Recital at St. Nicholas', Cole Abbey, Queen Victoria Street, on the 1st ult.

Miss Maud Leslie gave her annual Concert, on the 7th ult., at the Lecture Hall, Walworth. Miss Leslie was assisted by her pupil, Miss Yeatman, Miss Macaffe, Miss L. Robins, Messrs. T. Maude, Sydney Herbert, and H. Phillips. Pianoforte solos were admirably rendered by Miss Alice Newdick and Miss Kate A. Davies. Miss Leslie was much applauded in all her songs. Miss Davies was an efficient accompanist.

The Organ Recital at the Bow and Bromley Institute, on Saturday, the 19th ult., was given by Mr. H. C. Tonking, Sub-Professor of the Organ, Royal Academy of Music, and Organist of All Saints', Clapton. Miss Eleanor Rees was the vocalist and Mr. Bernard M. Carrodus the violinist. The hall was crowded, and the Recital was admitted to be one of the best of the season.

Mr. Francis Adams, Organist and Choirmaster to Bexley Heath Congregational Church, was on Saturday, the 19th ult., presented with an exquisitely chased tea and coffee service, by the friends and choir of the Dalston Congregational Church, where Mr. Adams had, during the past eight years, fulfilled the duties of organist and choirmaster.

On the Tuesdays during Lent the choir of St. John's, Waterloo Road, S.E., have given performances of sacred music, including Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" and Thirteenth Psalm, and selections from Sir Arthur Sullivan's Oratorio "The Prodigal Son," the solos by Masters Warren and Long and Miss Van Heddeghem. The series of Organ Recitals will be resumed after Easter. Handel's "Messiah" is announced to be given on the 6th inst., by the Kyrle Choir, the Organist being Mr. Henry J. B. Dart. In order to give short Oratorios after the services, ladies and gentlemen are requested to join the choir, which it is proposed to enlarge from forty to sixty voices.

An Organ Recital, by Mr. F. J. Yeatman, was given in St. Barnabas' Church, Kentish Town, on Saturday, February 26. The programme, including Air with Variations (from Haydn's Symphony in D), Prelude and Fugue in G major (Bach), Quasi Allegretto in A (Smart), and Allegretto in B minor (Guilmant), was excellently rendered. Vocal selections were contributed by Mr. and Mrs. Albert Rayment.

At the Conversazione given on the 15th ult., by Theresa, Countess of Shrewsbury, at her residence in Lowndes Square, Mr. Eade Montefiore had the direction of the musical portion of the entertainment, the artists being Miss Mary Morgan, Mrs. Moncrieff, Mr. Barrington Foote, Mr. Charles Ackerman, Mr. Eade Montefiore, Mr. T. Maude, and Mr. H. Knight.

Mr. Odoardo Barri has been appointed Musical Director, for the summer season, of the Concerts at the Winter Gardens, Blackpool. In addition to an efficient orchestra, Mr. Barri will have a select choir of children's voices.

Part of Gaul's Passion Service was sung at Holy Trinity Church, Upper Tooting, on Friday, the 4th ult. The solos were well rendered by Messrs. E. Bryant and J. Donnell Balfe. Mr. Alfred Physick (the Organist and Choirmaster of the Church) presided at the organ.

It is announced that the musical setting of Lord Rosslyn's lyric in commemoration of Her Majesty's Jubilee, which appeared lately in Blackwood, has been entrusted to Sir Herbert Oakeley.

We understand that Mr. Eugene Gigout, the eminent French organist, will again visit this country in the course of the present month. During his stay he will give several Recitals, both in London and in the country.

Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Crucifixion" will be sung at a Special Service at St. John's, Bethnal Green, on the evening of Good Friday.

Madame Frickenhaus and Herr Josef Ludwig announce a series of Chamber Concerts to take place in Princes' Hall, on May 7 and 21, June 11 and 25.

Mr. Fred. S. Oram has accepted the Conductorship of the Tottenham Philharmonic Society.

REVIEWS.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D, by W. Howard Stables; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D, by J. Patterson Shaw; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat, by Arthur R. Whitley. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The evening service of Mr. Stables shows talent, but it may fail to win general acceptance in consequence of a certain extravagance, which shows itself particularly in abrupt changes of key. After four verses in D we have two in B major, and passages to follow in E flat minor and E natural major, with an equally abrupt transition to the original key. These would prove trying except to highly trained singers, and besides are confusing to the ear. In its general character the service is bold and festive. The settings of Mr. Shaw and Mr. Whitley are simpler, and both are smoothly written, without any distinctive feature. There is not much to choose between them, but, on the whole, the latter is the more pleasing of the two.

John Gilpin; or, The Ride to Ware. A Humorous Cantata, for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra. Words by Cowper. Music by Edmund Rogers. [Weekes and Co.]

The composer of this piece has not only set the fashion of writing "Humorous Cantatas," but has shown us in his "Jack and the Beanstalk," "Blue Beard," and other works of this class, that it is possible to compose comic music without being vulgar, or degenerating into obvious burlesque of standard compositions. "John Gilpin" is one more successful specimen of Mr. Rogers' powers, and fully deserves to take its place amongst its many predecessors from the same pen. Commencing with an instrumental introduction, we have the quaint and well known words of Cowper cleverly thrown into solos for soprano, contralto, tenor, and bass; choruses, and an unaccompanied quartet, all of which, although not demanding high-class criticism upon their merits, are, we may conscientiously affirm, sufficiently well set to ensure the favourable verdict of an audience predisposed to be amused. From these we may select for special commendation the bass aria "I am a linendraper bold," the scena for bass and chorus, "Now see him mounted"—in which the perilous ride of the hero is most graphically described—the aria for contralto, "Now, Mistress Gilpin," and the final chorus, "Now, let us sing." The pianoforte accompaniment is effectively arranged for drawing-room performance; but choral societies should be informed that the full score and orchestral parts may be hired from the publishers.

Ye Men of Galilee. Anthem for Ascensiontide. Our blest Redeemer. Anthem for Whitsuntide. By the Rev. T. C. Lewis. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Simplicity, coupled with sound musicianship, characterise both these little Anthems. The first-named consists merely of a brief strain for tenors and basses in unison, and a chorus in measured phrases, like an extended hymn-tune. The other is more varied, but equally rhythmical. Mention should be made of a soprano solo, with Dykes's familiar tune, sung softly by the choir as an accompaniment. This cannot fail to prove effective. The Anthems are well within the means of ordinary amateur choirs.

The Widow of Nain. Sacred Cantata for Female Voices. By Frank J. Sawyer, Mus.D., Oxon. [Forsyth Brothers.]

A Sacred Cantata for female voices should be received with favour in all schools where the young ladies are trained to the appreciation of a higher class of composition than can be found amongst the conventional solo music of the day. The incident of the resuscitation of the Widow's son is clearly told in verse, well laid out for musical setting; and the music, without undue pretence, is appropriate, and sympathetic with the text throughout. A short introductory Chorus in G minor leads to a Chorus of Mourners—preceded by a brief Recitative for the Narrator—the feeling of which is faithfully reflected by the wailing phrases, both in the vocal and instrumental parts. Recitatives for the Narrator and the Widow are followed by a bright "Duet of Neighbours," in which the mourners are urged to assuage their grief, a simple yet melodious composition, contrasting effectively with the sombre music which precedes it. After a Recitative and Trio, the Youth is bidden by the Saviour to rise, and this is succeeded by a placid Choral. The Duet of thanks, for Mother and Son, is followed by the final Chorus, which, although short, contains some effective points. We cannot, perhaps, assert that Mr. Sawyer's music is ever so deeply impressive as the subject, in parts, seems to demand; but, being evidently written for juvenile vocalists, it is no small praise to say that it thoroughly fulfils the composer's intention.

Allegro in form of a Minuet. By W. G. Wood. (Original Compositions for the Organ, No. 55.) [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

At the first blush it might seem that the composer was ill-advised to choose the minuet form for an organ piece; but it is the form only and not the style that he has utilised. No one in listening to Mr. Wood's composition would recognise any resemblance to the dance in which our ancestors delighted. It is true organ music, and that of a superior kind. The principal section in C abounds in running quaver passages which are used imitatively with much effect. After a brief trio in A minor, which is followed by a portion of the opening section, we have a second trio in A flat, written as a two-part canon in the fifth for the clarinet, the left hand and pedals accompanying. This is cleverly done, but so easily and naturally does the music flow that no one unacquainted with canon would suspect any scholastic device. A reprise of the first part and a dignified coda bring this capital piece to a conclusion.

Waly, Waly. Song. Anonymous, 1720.
Through the wood, Laddie. Song. Words by Allan Ramsay.
Love will find out the way. Song. Old English.
Because. Song. Words by Adelaide A. Procter.
Composed by A. Stammit.
[Weekes and Co.]

Considering that many of the songs which daily come before us, however good musically, seem scarcely to have been inspired by the words, Mr. Stammit deserves the warmest commendation for the deep sympathy he has shown with the excellent verses selected for the compositions under notice. "Waly, Waly" has an eloquent subject in C minor, the change of time and key, with the syncopated accompaniment, being extremely happy; the quaint simplicity of Allan Ramsay's lines, in the second song on our list, is well reflected in the quiet theme in A minor; and the obstinate figure in the accompaniment of "Love will find out the way" gives much interest to a melodious and truly vocal melody. "Because" is an unpretentious ballad, somewhat more conventional than those already spoken of, but well harmonised and graceful throughout. We conscientiously recommend this group of vocal pieces to the attention of all in search of novelty.

Elements of Harmony and Counterpoint. By F. Davenport. [Longmans, Green and Co.]

Mr. Davenport has already published a very useful work on the Elements of Music, which is now adopted as a Text-book at the Royal Academy of Music, of which institution he is a Professor; and in the Manual before us he carries forward his plan of teaching through Harmony and Counterpoint. As his book is avowedly founded on the "Day" theory, to notice it critically would of course be to review a system now too well known to call for an examination of its merits; but we must say that the manner in which the facts are put forth and illustrated demands the very warmest praise; and we heartily commend the work to all students who desire a clear and concise exposition of the method which it advocates.

Annette. Song for a Baritone voice; with accompaniment of Pianoforte and Clarinet (or Violin, Viola, or Violoncello). Words by W. L. Courtney. Composed by Charles H. Lloyd. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

There is a charm, both in melody and treatment, throughout Mr. Lloyd's song, which cannot fail to impress all musical listeners; and baritone vocalists—who are not too well supplied with compositions especially written for their register—may rest assured that a treasure is here added to their répertoire, the value of which will be increased by time. The fervent expression of the words, the beautiful figure which runs through the accompaniment, and the artistic manner in which the obbligato part—almost equally well suited for any of the instruments named—is woven in with the voice, lift the composition so far above the songs of the day as to secure its admission into the classical concert-room, where artists to execute it, and audiences to appreciate it, will most surely be found. We shall indeed be glad to welcome any number of such compositions as "Annette" from the pen of Mr. Lloyd.

Service of the Holy Communion, for first and second soprano voices. By the Rev. J. Baden Powell. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

According to a note this service was written for week-day celebrations at St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, when the tenors and basses are not available; and it is very reasonably suggested that it may be useful for other choirs similarly situated, and also for sisterhoods and schools. The good qualities to which we have drawn attention in previous notices of church compositions by Mr. Baden Powell, are even more prominent in this service. Its general character is bright and cheerful, and though the composer employs the traditional intonations for the Gloria and Credo, his style is modern and melodious. Very little, if any, trace of amateurishness may be discovered, and to sum up we fancy the service will supply a distinct want, and that in a highly acceptable way.

Scène de Ballet; The Gipsies. Composed by H. M. Higgs. [Metzler and Co.]

These three pieces, although evidently written for the orchestra, will be most acceptable to pianists who can fully enter into the dramatic feeling they demand. No. 1, Allegro, in E minor and major, has many interesting points, the dreamy opening, the two bars of 5-4 time, and the burst in the tonic major, being not only extremely effective, but free from that affectation of profundity which disfigures so much modern music of this class. No. 2, Moderato, has a restless Introduction, which eventually settles down in the key of G major, with a melodious theme, accompanied by a running semiquaver bass; and No. 3 is a tuneful and extremely graceful Waltz. All these movements are sufficiently well contrasted to sustain the attention of an audience; and we can well imagine that at the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts, where this "Scène" was performed, the exceptional merit of the composition must have been fully recognised.

Lullaby. Welcome. For the Pianoforte. By G. A. Macfarren. [Edwin Ashdown.]

These two pieces, forming Nos. 4 and 5 of Six Romances, cannot be too strongly recommended, both as highly finished Sketches by an artist who has sufficiently proved his power in works of greater importance, and as valuable Exercises for students. "Lullaby" is a tranquil melody for the upper part of the right hand, with a sympathetic flowing semiquaver accompaniment, played chiefly with the lower part of the same hand, the punctuation throughout being so distinctly marked as to admit of no doubt of the composer's intention. In "Welcome" the theme is given to the right hand, the thumb only occasionally touching a single note of the left hand arpeggio accompaniment. As companion pieces these charming trifles will doubtless be often played by those who have sufficiently trained mind and fingers to do them the justice they merit. The due rendering of the several parts in both these pieces will be much facilitated by careful attention to the fingering of Mr. Walter Macfarren.

The Altar Hymnal. With music compiled and arranged by A. H. Brown. [Griffith, Farran and Co.]

According to the title this is "a book of song for use at the celebration of the Holy Eucharist," and a glance at the general preface by the Rev. T. T. Carter shows that it is intended for places where full ritual prevails. Such terms as "Proper of the Seasons," "Sequences," "Post-consecration," and "Ablutions" are scarcely familiar to the majority of churchmen. Obviously criticism in this place has only to do with the music of the work, which seems well selected for its special purpose. Two tunes are given to every one of the 180 hymns, one plain song and the other modern—we may add, very modern—abounding in dotted notes and quavers, and generally somewhat sensuous in character.

Awake, O Happy Nation! National song and chorus. Composed in commemoration of Her Majesty's Jubilee, 1887. Words by Henry Rose. Music by J. Munro Coward. [Metzler and Co.]

Occasional songs, especially designed for popular use, scarcely appeal to coldly critical judgment; but we may say that Mr. Coward's contribution to the national rejoicing is in every respect admirably suited for singing in large gatherings; and as it may be performed in public "without fee or licence," there can be little doubt of its extensive appreciation. The band parts are published, and it is also arranged as a four-part song, or anthem, both in the Tonic Sol-fa and the Old Notation.

The Congregational Psalmist Hymnal. [Hodder and Stoughton.]

Apparently the making of hymn books has no end, for scarcely a month passes without our attention being called to one or more examples, designed of course to meet some alleged want not hitherto supplied. The present, however, is only an enlarged edition of a work first published as far back as 1858 for use in Nonconformist places of worship. The new edition may claim to be the largest collection that has yet appeared, as it contains no fewer than 921 hymns with tunes. The former are edited by Dr. Allon, and the latter have been revised by Dr. W. H. Monk. It is noteworthy that while the Established Church has lately concerned itself far more than formerly with congregational singing, Dissent has at the same time busied itself with levelling up, and there is really very little in the present book to distinguish it from a church hymnal. All the most popular lyrics by modern writers are included, and as with the words, so with the music. The florid abominations which were once heard alike in church and chapel are conspicuous by their absence, and we wish the editor had also sternly excluded all adaptations from secular works, though happily these are few in number.

Grand March for the Organ. By F. Robinson. [Wood and Co.]

What constitutes the difference between a grand march and an ordinary march we do not profess to know. However, waiving its ambitious title, Mr. Robinson's composition has some good points, though it is defaced by certain crudities. One of these occurs in the principal theme, where the dominant thirteenth in F minor is followed by the triad of B flat minor with harsh effect. The brief middle section, or trio, is the best part of the March, and, speaking generally, Mr. Robinson shows ability, though at present it is somewhat in the rough.

In After Years. Song. Words by Churchill Sibley.
Two Hearts. Song. Words by Churchill Sibley.
The Gondolier. Song. Words by Madeleine L. E. W. Composed by Churchill Sibley. [Ambrose and Co.]

The first of these songs has a flowing melody, vocal, and well adapted to the words, but the thin accompaniment, with the voice throughout, becomes wearisome. "Two Hearts" preserves the same character in the pianoforte part, the harmony however, and the change of time somewhat redeeming the conventional style of the composition. We like "The Gondolier" better than its companions, although it is evident that the composer has an objection to making the pianoforte do much more than support the voice. The change to the tonic minor is effective and gives a freshness to the principal theme on its return. "Gondolier" songs, however, with the inevitable Requiem from the "holy voices" of the singers at a convent, are so terribly overdone that we shall be glad to welcome composers in something that will awaken a new train of ideas, and as Mr. Sibley has sufficiently shown by these songs that he might prove successful if he were to turn a little from the beaten track, why should he not make the attempt?

FOREIGN NOTES.

Jubilee performances are to be given throughout Germany of Mozart's "Don Giovanni," on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of that operatic masterpiece, which occurs on October 29. Efforts are, in the meantime, being used in various quarters to purge the work of the numerous inaccuracies which have crept into the score in the course of time, and to arrive at a representation as near as possible in accordance with the composer's intentions. An interesting communication on the subject from the pen of Professor Gustav Engel, published in the Berlin Vossische Zeitung, and summed up in a Times paragraph of the 23rd ult., points out, inter alia, that "in the Finale of the opera, from the appearance of the statue of the Commendatore to the end of the work, three trombones are a regular portion of the orchestra, whereas in the original score written by Mozart himself (in the possession of Madame Pauline Viardot Garcia) those trombones do not appear. It is a fact that when the opera was first produced in Prague, under Mozart's personal direction, he wrote out on a sheet of music paper the music for the three trombones. The late Julius Rietz declared that he has seen this sheet of music, but no one knows what has become of it. Herr Engel is of opinion that, while the oboes and bassoons form a very suitable accompaniment for what is intended to be the hollow and weird voice of the Commendatore's ghost, the effect is marred by the loud trombones, which also nearly extinguish what ought to be the decisive expression of the trumpets in the closing passage of the dialogue between Don Giovanni and the Statue. On the other hand, in favour of the trombones, there is the universal practice, and the fact that in the autograph score Mozart himself wrote music for three trombones as accompaniment to the words of the Statue in the churchyard scene. Professor Engel proposes that a mixed jury of musicians and accomplished amateurs should decide whether the trombones should be retained or discarded." Amongst other questions likely to be finally settled on the occasion of the forthcoming celebration, will also be that of the uniform adoption by German theatres of whichever may be considered the best German rendering of Da Ponte's libretto, the original version, still in use at many operatic establishments of the Fatherland, being an altogether unworthy, and, in many respects, grotesquely absurd production.

It is stated in German papers that on the occasion of the recent first performance of Herr Rüfer's new opera "Merlin," at the Berlin Opera, Dr. Hans von Bülow, who was about to take his seat in the stalls, was peremptorily requested to leave the house which, as will be remembered, the eminent pianist had some time ago, with more wit than discretion, characterised as the "Circus Huelsen."

Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig, have just completed the issue of a standard edition of the works of Robert Schumann, critically revised under the superintendence of the composer's widow. It comprises 156 numbers, divided into thirteen series, and forms a worthy pendant to the superb editions of the earlier German classics published by the above-named eminent firm.

According to the Neue Berliner Musik Zeitung, the orchestral body of the defunct Philharmonic Society of that capital will not be dissolved, but will carry on an independent existence for the purpose of giving a series of subscription Concerts during the Berlin season.

At the Munich Hof-Theater it is intended shortly to produce one of Wagner's two unrecognised early operas, to wit, "Das Liebesverbot," or "Die Feen," an experiment which will scarcely meet with the approval of the more thoroughgoing admirers of the "later Wagner."

Johann Strauss is just now engaged upon a new comic opera, the libretto by Victor Leon, author of the successful comedy "Der Doppelgänger." The new work, which is expected to surpass all Herr Strauss's previous efforts in the domain of operetta, is to be brought out ere long at the Theatre An der Wien, in the Austrian capital.

A Beethoven Museum was to be opened on the 26th ult., at Heiligenstadt, near Vienna, comprising a number of objects having reference to the composer's career, and forming the nucleus of what is intended to assume, in time, the proportions of a truly representative institution.

At a Concert recently given at Cassel, in conjunction with Madame Marcella Sembrich, by Miss Hare, the talented young English pianist met with a highly favourable reception.

Under the presidency of M. Ambroise Thomas, the director of the Paris Conservatoire, a committee of prominent French musicians, including M. Gounod, has been formed in the French capital for the purpose of promoting the publication of the complete works of Cherubini. The composer of "Medée" and of the "Requiem," although Italian by birth, identified himself for the greater part of his career with French musical life, in which, for a number of years, he occupied the leading position as Principal of the Conservatoire. Accordingly, the projected "national" tribute to the memory of a composer whom Beethoven himself called "the greatest master of his time," emanates with peculiar appropriateness from French quarters, and will be welcomed by all amateurs. The publication in question, according to Le Figaro, is intended to take rank with the standard editions of German classics issued by the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel, and is to be followed by a similar collection of the complete works of Rameau, the founder of the national French opera seria.

M. Gounod, who, some years since, wrote the incidental music to a drama entitled "Jeanne d'Arc," from the pen of M. Barbier, is reported to be engaged just now upon the composition of an opera bearing the same title, and in which the numbers written for the former work will be utilised. According to a statement widely disseminated by the Continental press, M. Gounod intends to complete this work in the course of the approaching spring.

M. Saint-Saëns's new opera "Proserpine" was successfully brought out on the 16th ult., at the Paris Opéra Comique. The libretto, from the pen of M. Auguste Vacquerie, is founded on the same author's dramatic poem of that title, the plot being laid in mediæval Italy. An "Ave Maria," the Finale of the second act, and a Bacchanalian song in the third, were among the numbers chiefly applauded on the first night, when the Finale in question had to be repeated. The performance, according to a correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, was "in every way unexceptionable. The orchestra was simply perfect, and the costumes and scenic arrangements were of that thoroughly artistic character which is always to be found in a theatre managed by M. Carvalho. There is no such accomplished metteur en scène in Paris as the present manager of the Opéra Comique." The general verdict of the composer's compatriots is decidedly favourable to the new work, some of them, however, deploring the frequent use made therein of Wagnerian methods, consisting more especially in the adoption of what has been characterised as the "continuous melody" in the scores of that master.

Grétry's opera "L'Epreuve Villageoise" is about to be revived at the Paris Opéra Comique. The work has not been performed for many years.

M. Lamoureux announces ten performances of Wagner's "Lohengrin," to be given at the Eden Theatre during the latter half of the present and the first half of next month. There are to be two distinct sets of interpreters, and the prices of admission will be high. A great deal of interest naturally clusters round the performance, arrived, at last, within measurable distance, of Wagner's most popular music-drama, so long withheld, in its stage representation, from Parisian amateurs, and so fruitful of angry controversy in French musical circles.

The regular season of the Châtelet Concerts came to a close on the 20th ult., but M. Colonne will, doubtless, add some extra performances to their number. Schumann's "Manfred" was heard twice during the month, and derived additional interest from the text being spoken by members of the Théâtre Français, the part of Manfred being allotted to M. Mounet-Sully, the successful interpreter of Hamlet on the French national stage.

M. Alexandre Guilmant's annual Organ Concerts, in combination with an orchestra, will be resumed at the Paris Trocadéro on the 6th inst. These interesting and high-class entertainments are now entering upon their tenth season, their progress having been marked by a steady increase in the attendance. M. Colonne will be the orchestral conductor.

Mr. Frederick Lamond, the highly gifted young Scottish pianist, has been delighting Russian audiences at a series of Recitals given by him at St. Petersburg last month. We have received copies of the Novoe Vrenia, the Vedomosti, and the Journal de St. Petersbourg, all of them leading Russian journals, the musical columns of which teem with expressions of admiration and praise concerning the young artist's transcendent talent and exceptional attainments on his instrument.

Several important numbers from M. Gounod's Oratorio "Mors et Vita" were included in the programme of a choral and instrumental Concert, given on the 1st ult. at the Oratorio di San Filippo Neri, of Genoa, under the direction of the Maestro, Carlo del Signore, the choristers having been the members of the Società Corale, and the principal solo vocalists Signora Emilia Rubadi and Signor G. Alberti.

The failure is announced of the directors of the La Scala Theatre, of Milan (Messrs. Corti), the deficit of their management being estimated at some 120,000 francs. Meanwhile, the performances, including those of Verdi's "Otello," are being continued under the auspices of an temporary committee. It is rumoured that "Otello," with a German version of Signor Boito's libretto, will be produced this season at the Victoria Theatre, Berlin.

At a recent first performance, by the Orchestral Society of Rome, of Hector Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust," the chef d'œuvre of the French master was enthusiastically received.

We read in the Daily Telegraph of the 18th ult.: "English amateurs have, just now, a right to feel interested in Signor Mancinelli, whose oratorio 'Isaiah' will be produced at the Norwich Festival in October next. The composer, as director of the orchestra at the Theatre Royal, Madrid, took his 'benefit' there on Tuesday week last, with remarkable success, his share of the proceeds amounting to 12,000 francs, to say nothing of many valuable presents. Several of Signor Mancinelli's works figured in the programme, including the Overture to 'Cleopatra,' and selections from 'Isora di Provenza.' The Epoca describes the composer as a 'devoted admirer of Richard Wagner'; which fact will sufficiently appear when his new piece is performed. 'Isaiah' may be described, not inaccurately, as a declamatory oratorio; in that respect, to the best of our knowledge, standing alone. It represents Wagner in the domain of the sacred musical epic; it makes, therefore, a unique appearance, and is destined to excite no little interest, combined, perhaps, with a great deal of discussion."

Rubinstein's Opera "Nero" met with a most enthusiastic reception on the occasion of its first performance last month by the American Opera Company of New York, at the Metropolitan Opera House of that cosmopolitan city. The New York World says: "The success was overwhelming, and marks an epoch in grand opera in English in America." Although choral and orchestral works by Rubinstein have been frequently performed here, the present is the first production of any opera from his pen. Mr. Theodore Thomas conducted.

Madame Adelina Patti is announced to begin a series of operatic performances, extending over a fortnight, at the Metropolitan Theatre of New York on the 11th inst., appearing in "Traviata," "Semiramide," "Martha," "Faust," "Lucia," and "Carmen," with a company collected from various sources. After this short season, the diva will give the same operas at Boston, Philadelphia, and other cities, and about the middle of May take a positively last farewell of America.

Herr Niels W. Gade, the well-known Danish composer, has recently celebrated his seventieth birthday.

The death is announced, at Dresden, of Herr Ernst Kaps, the well known pianoforte manufacturer of that town.

At St. Petersburg died, on February 27, Alexandre Porfiriévitch Borodine, a musician held in very high esteem in his native Russia, the composer of two symphonies and numerous minor orchestral, chamber, and vocal compositions, as also of a successful opera "Prince Tgor." Borodine was an adherent to what is known as the new Russian school in matters musical.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Respecting the closing sentence of your brief exposition of Mr. Weber's paper, entitled "On Melody in Speech," I beg to say that the Musics of Nature have in many instances been more or less fully and ably investigated. Amongst others, by Schleiden: "Die Natur der Tone und Die Töne der Natur"; E. Wagner: "Dialekte der Singvögel"; Kullak: "Die Tonkunst und ihre Faktoren"; as well as by Hoffmann and Schubert, theorists of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, from which it appears that Mr. Weber comes rather late in the day with his intended startling revelations, and that none of the readers of The Musical Times need waste time with "experimenting" in this sphere of musical art, or giving birth to any more books or papers on that subject. Some ten years ago I read somewhere something also of the melodies and harmonies of the costermonger tribes of Europe and America, but the author's name has slipped my memory. However, to any one anxious to collect such "beautiful and touching, melodious and pleasant" cries, I can, and am willing, to forward at least a few amazing specimens thereof. It is certainly new to me that dogs and cats utter "distinct fifths," horses descending chromatic scales (in tempo largo the horses do, perhaps, the enharmonic); about the donkey-octave Mr. Weber is nearer the mark. With knowledge of such kind it would be highly interesting and of no extraordinary difficulty if some enterprising artist were to get up a Bestial Choral Society. There are in all probability animals to be found for every interval of the scale, and they need only to be trained to bark their fifths, neigh their semitones, or bray their octaves, &c., in due time. Surely such animal choirmaster might have a rare chance at the "Durham County Asylum" (Musical Times, page 148). What a pity that such men as Professors Helmholtz, Tyndall, and others were ignorant of those natural phenomena! That Mr. Weber compares telegraph wires with an Æolian harp is not beyond imagination; the cluster of wires along some lines of railway, especially when one sees them "blowed," might put such a notion into an observant head; however, I have never yet been fortunate enough to hear them wire "solemn strains and most perfect ideal harmonies." Is Mr. Weber going to publish the two windy compositions he copied from nature? It may be regretted that Mr. Weber's discovery—"We speak in melodies and harmonies" (?)—has not been made earlier, as then all our composers of vocal music hitherto, from Palestrina down to Brahms, might not have wasted their lives with writing melodies and harmonies. As, according to Mr. Weber, we can trace a speaker's character by the quality of his voice, is it to be taken for granted that a person with an indifferent voice must be an indifferent character? Respecting the division of conversation in keys, I must observe that I have frequently heard also "*un*common conversations" in all sorts of major keys, and vice versâ, modulating often "very strangely." Experimenting on Mr. Weber's suggestion, I also found that we, five adults, residing under one roof, do not belong to the common genus that converses either in B flat, B, or C, except one, who generally "harmonizes" or speaks in B, but double flat; the other four vary from low G to G the octave. Might not the champagne have tuned the people of Rheims to B flat?

Well, Mr. Editor, I think with you. This "On Melody in Speech," so far as I have learnt to know it from your extract in the March number of the Musical Times, is indeed a curious paper. You also deserve thanks for its further dissemination. Yet I think it hard on Mr. Weber that he should be held up, when ninety-five out of every hundred authors in every sphere of literature of every description do the same and often worse. And so it is not only in literature—specifically in musical literature—but also in all other departments of music.

Here is not the place for me to suggest remedies, but I think it would be at least one great boon if the higher criticism would rigorously expose all that which ignorance and self-conceit throws daily into our faces, as you have shown up Mr. Weber's attempt at making himself immortal.

Yours very truly, Alfred Jaffé.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Alexandria, N.B.—The Vale of Leven Choral Society gave a very successful performance of Judas Maccabæus, on the 18th ult., before a large audience. The choruses were sung with vigour and effect, and the soloists (Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Miss Mainds, Mr. Macdonald, and Mr. Black) were well received. Mr. Cole's band, from Glasgow, formed an efficient orchestra. Mr. Love conducted, and Mr. Folkes presided at the harmonium.

Bolton.—Another of a series of Chamber Concerts, promoted by Signor Risegari and Mons. Vieuxtemps, was given on the 23rd ult., and was heartily appreciated. For the rest, the month has not produced anything special. Organ Recitals and popular Concerts have been given at intervals, and have brought together crowded audiences.

Burnham, Somerset.—A Concert was given by Mr. C. A. Nicholls at the Queen's Hotel, on Friday, the 18th ult. The following artists appeared: Miss Marie Hayward and Mr. W. J. Trenchard (vocalists), Mr. Penny, R.A.M., accompanist and solo pianist, and Mr. Windeatt and his daughter (violin), and two sons, one of whom gave a solo on the cornet. The programme was excellently rendered, and in every respect thoroughly successful.

Calcutta.—The Jubilee Service at St. Paul's Cathedral was numerously attended, and the whole of the music excellently rendered. The service, which was extremely simple, consisted mainly of Psalms xxi. and cxlv., the Te Deum, the Creed, and a few appropriate prayers, an Anthem, the Sermon, and the Benediction. The Te Deum was Tours in F (the band of the Viceroy materially aiding in bringing out the effect of the composition), and the Anthem was especially composed for the Jubilee by Mr. Ernest Slater, Organist of the Cathedral. The sermon was preached by Bishop Johnson.

Chertsey.—The members of the Albion Social Club terminated their third season on the 17th ult., with a most successful Concert. The artists were Messrs. F. Ferrani, W. Bradford, J. F. Baily, W. Blount, and R. B. Sadley. The feature of the evening was the violin playing of Mr. H. Lee. Mr. James Hallé conducted, and contributed two pianoforte solos.

Cockermouth.—An excellent performance of Handel's Messiah was given by the Harmonic Society on the 16th ult., in the New Drill Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Moorhouse, Miss Alice Wolstenholme, Mr. Cuthbert Blacow, and Mr. Noah Johnstone. The work was in every respect finely rendered, the choir, consisting of 100 voices, being thoroughly efficient, and reflecting much credit upon the training of Mr. P. T. Freeman (Organist and Choirmaster of Crosthwaite Church, Keswick), who conducted. There was a good orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. F. W. Schofield.

Dudley.—The performance of Handel's Messiah by the Vocal Union, at the Public Hall, on the 15th ult., was in every respect an unqualified success. The principal vocalists—Madame Wilson-Osman, Miss E. Hemming, Mr. H. Mobberley, and Mr. John Ridding—were highly efficient in the solo music, and the choir gave an excellent rendering of the choruses. Very great credit is due to Mr. B. Barlow, the Conductor, for his admirable training of the choir.

Eastbourne.—A performance of Haydn's Creation was given at the Town Hall, on the 2nd ult., by the members of the Musical Society, under the conductorship of Dr. W. H. Sangster. The solo vocalists were Miss Kate Fusselle, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Frank May. The orchestra was efficiently led by Mr. E. J. Sangster, and Mr. S. G. R. Coles, F.C.O., ably presided at the piano. The work was excellently rendered throughout.——On the 16th ult. the last of a most interesting series of eight Classical Chamber Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Charles Williams, was given at the Town Hall. These Concerts have been well attended, and have given great satisfaction in the town. Among the executants who have appeared may be mentioned:—Pianoforte, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Madame Rose Koenig, Mr. M. Barton, and Mr. Williams; violin, Miss Emily Shinner, Mr. Henkel, and Mr. Sutcliffe; viola, Mr. Hollander and Mr. Kreuz; violoncello, Mr. Whitehouse, Mr. Peruzzi, and Mr. Squire; vocalists, Miss Liza Lehmann, Miss Glazebrook, Madame Sandon, Mr. Kenningham, Mr. Price, and Mr. Ridding; clarinet, Mr. Julian Egerton.——Miss Carlisle gave two Vocal Recitals at the Church Room, on the 9th and 23rd ult., when Mr. Sinclair Dunn, Mr. A. Reakes, and Miss Carlisle contributed songs; Miss Daisy Adams, recitations; Mr. W. Squire, violoncello solos; and Mr. Earnshaw, pianoforte solos, also officiating as accompanist.

Edinburgh.—Organ Recitals were given in the Music Class Room of the University by Sir Herbert Oakeley, on the 3rd and 15th ult., the programmes of which were in the highest degree interesting. An air from one of Handel's Italian operas (Sosarme), the same composer's well known March from Scipio, and a Fugue by Bach, at the first Recital, were much appreciated. The following Recital was selected from the works of great masters between A.D. 1653 and 1847, and was listened to with an earnest attention which must have been extremely gratifying to the professor who had provided so excellent and valuable a lesson to the students.——The Students' Annual Concert was represented this year by two Choral Recitals, in the Music Classroom, on the 18th and 19th ult. The programme was the same on both evenings, and comprised a selection of choruses, songs, and organ solos. Mr. J. O. Sinclair conducted, and Sir H. Oakeley presided at the organ.

Girvan, N.B.—The tenth annual Concert of the Musical Association took place on February 25. The programme included Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, which was given under the direction of Mr. McNabb, of Glasgow. The soloists were Miss Vinnie Beaumont and Mr. Dunsmore. Miss McConnell presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Finlay, Organist of Linlithgow Abbey, at the harmonium.

Grantham.—The members of the Amateur Musical Union gave a performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul, before a large audience, on Thursday, the 17th ult., in the Exchange Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Adelaide Mullen, Mrs. Spriggs, Mr. Henry Beaumont, and Mr. Bingley Shaw; leader of the band, Mr. Hodgkinson; Conductor, Mr. H. P. Dickenson.

Hailsham.—A performance of Cowen's Rose Maiden was given at the Corn Exchange, on the 8th ult., by the Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. S. G. R. Coles, F.C.O. The solos were well rendered by local amateurs. The choral singing gave evidence of careful training. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous.

Hamilton, Canada.—Dr. C. Villiers Stanford's Oratorio The Three Holy Children was performed by the Philharmonic Society, on Friday, the 11th ult. The solos were taken by Mrs. Luther (of Buffalo), Messrs. G. Clarke, S. Grant, F. W. Wodell, and R. Devine. The preparatory drilling was done by Mr. J. E. P. Aldous, and the Concert was conducted by Mr. F. H. Torrington, of Toronto.

Hanwell.—On Tuesday, the 8th ult., a Concert was given in the Lecture Hall. The vocalists were Miss Fusselle, Miss Scoones, Misses Lambert, Mr. T. J. Carter, and Dr. Alexander. Cello solos were contributed by Mr. T. W. Mitchell, and pianoforte solos by Miss Cannon and Mr. F. E. Choveaux.

Hollins, near Manchester.—On the 16th ult. a fine organ—recently built by P. Conacher and Co., Huddersfield—was opened in the Wesleyan Chapel by Mr. W. W. Wilde, Organist, &c., of Morecambe Parish Church. The programme of the Recital included selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Lemmens, Handel, Sterndale Bennett, Rossini, Schubert, and Smart, and was ably rendered. The Recital was interspersed with vocal solos, well given by Miss E. Allen and Mr. T. Allen.

Hove, Brighton.—The first Concert of the season of the Brighton and Hove Choral and Orchestral Society, took place on Thursday, the 24th ult. The principal item in the programme was Mozart's Requiem Mass, which was well sung by the choir and principals—Madame Worrell, Miss Clara Myers, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. R. E. Miles. In the second part the chief feature was the brilliant playing of Miss Ethel Savery, in Grieg's Concerto in A minor, in which she showed great skill and precision, and Liszt's Polonaise. Dr. Sawyer conducted, and received well-merited applause.

Hurstpierpoint.—On Shrove Tuesday a Concert was given at St. John's College, when Dr. Stanford's Cantata The Revenge was performed by the College choir, under the conductorship of Mr. F. J. Karn, Mus. Bac., Cantab., the Director of Music. This is one of the very earliest performances of The Revenge in the provinces, and it was excellently rendered. The soprano parts were well sung by the boys, and the choir proved quite equal to the task. Mr. B. A. Cogswell, A.C.O., acted as an efficient accompanist on the pianoforte. The second part of the programme consisted of a selection of part-songs and solos, including a song "At last," by the Conductor, which was sung by Mr. J. S. Chivers.

Leeds.—The afternoon services of sacred music, at Holy Trinity Church, Boar Lane, which were commenced in Advent, were continued during the Lenten season. The service on Sunday, the 19th ult., consisted of a performance of Dr. Stainer's new Cantata The Crucifixion. The Cantata was sung in a most efficient manner by the choir and members of the church. The solos were given by Mr. Percy Leigh (tenor) and Mr. Dealtry (bass). Warm praise must especially be awarded for the rendering of a beautiful quartet, "God so loved the world," by Miss Mirfin and Messrs. Scholes, Leigh, and Dealtry. Great credit is due to Mr. J. W. Hudson, the Organist and Choirmaster, not only for the care he had taken in bringing his choir to such perfection, but also for the style in which he played the organ accompaniments, upon which so much of the beauty of a composition such as this depends.——The Borough Organist again attracted a large audience to the Victoria Hall, on Saturday evening, the 19th ult. The programme comprised two pieces, performed for the first time at this hall. The first was a composition of Saint-Saëns, an eccentric, difficult, but in many respects beautiful, Fantasia in E flat, which was performed by its composer last year at one of Mr. Ford's popular Concerts in the Coliseum. Dr. Spark had evidently bestowed considerable pains upon the work, and the result was a thoroughly characteristic and in every respect admirable rendering of it. The other novelty was a "Jubilee Fantasia" for the organ on national airs, another of the many compositions from the prolific pen of Dr. Spark. It opens with an introduction foreshadowing the principal theme—"Come, if you dare," followed by the original song, in its powerful simplicity and quaint melody, varied with much effect, as were also the familiar strains of "Rule Britannia" and "God save the Queen." It is needless to say that this was played with a spirit and effect which thoroughly charmed all who heard it.

Leytonstone.—A Concert was given at the Baptist Schoolroom, Cann Hall Road, on the 7th ult., before a large audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Clara Dowle, who was encored in all her songs; Miss Renaut, and Miss Watkins. Miss Adela Duckham played a violin solo (encored), and also took part in a vocal duet with Miss Maud Watts. The accompanists were Miss Reeve and Miss Adela Duckham.

Leyton.—A Concert was given by The Æolian Lady Orchestra, before a crowded audience, on the 10th ult. The Conductor was Miss Bessie Cox, Professor of Singing at the Guildhall School of Music. The programme, which was highly interesting, was well carried out, one number, a "Minuet and Rondo," from a Symphony (MS.) by Miss Edith Swepstone (who conducted it), being excellently rendered.

Margate.—A very interesting Organ Recital was given in St. Paul's Church, on Friday, the 11th ult., by Mr. Arthur Fagge (Organist to the Albert Palace Association), which was attended by a large and appreciative audience.——The Cliftonville Choral Society's annual Concert took place on the 17th ult., when Mendelssohn's Athalie and a miscellaneous selection formed the programme. The soloists were Miss Annie Matthews, Miss Meta Russell, and Miss Nash. The Rev. Gordon Calthrop, M.A., Vicar of St. Augustine's, Highbury, read the connecting passages; Mr. Starr, R.A.M., led the band, and Mr. J. W. Pearson was the Conductor.

Matlock Bath.—Mr. J. G. Barker, Organist of Matlock Bath Church, gave a Concert, on the 1st ult., in the Assembly Room. The vocalists were Miss M. Bown, Miss Mallett, Mr. J. L. Greaves, and Mr. T. H. Lord; violinist, Mr. W. E. Timmins. Mr. Barker contributed pianoforte solos, and shared the duties of accompanist with Mr. Piggott.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The last Hallé Concert of the present season, and it is to be feared—in consequence of the want of patronage—the final appearance of this famous orchestra in Newcastle, took place in the Town Hall, on February 28. Raff's Im Walde Symphony, and Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, finely played by Mr. Hallé, were the most important items in the programme, and both were received with the warmest applause. Miss Julie Schow-Rosing was the vocalist. Messrs. Alderson and Brentnall have thoroughly maintained the high character of these Concerts, and it is sincerely to be hoped that when their financial statement is made up the deficiency will not be found so great as they anticipate. ——On Monday, Wednesday, and Friday evenings during Holy Week, Dr. Stainer's Crucifixion will be sung at St. Andrew's Church, by a large choir, under the direction of Mr. T. Albion Alderson, the Organist and Director of the Choir. Haydn's Passion Music has been sung (a portion each Sunday evening) in place of the ordinary Anthem during Lent.

Nottingham.—On Friday, the 14th ult., the Forest Cricket Club gave a Concert in the Mechanics' Hall, before a good audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Kate McKrill, R.A.M., Miss Fannie Lymn, R.A.M., Mr. Charles Gerring, and Mr. Bingley Shaw. The Nottingham Select Glee Party contributed several items. Mr. A. Richards was solo pianist and accompanist.——The last Concert for the present season of the Sacred Harmonic Society took place at the Albert Hall, on the 22nd ult., when Berlioz's Faust was performed with much success. The principal vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Barrington Foote, and Mr. Tufnail, all of whom gave the utmost effect to the difficult music entrusted to them. The choir was excellent throughout, and reflected the greatest credit upon the training of Mr. Adcock, who must evidently have worked hard to attain so satisfactory a result. Mr. Charles Hallé, whose band was engaged on the occasion, conducted with his accustomed skill.

Pilsley, Derbyshire.—On Tuesday, the 15th ult., a Jubilee Concert was given before a large audience. The vocalists were Miss Drabble, Miss Chadwick, Miss Rollinson, Mrs. Trealoar, Mr. Windle, Mr. Lord, and Mr. Reynolds; solo violin, Miss Florrie Rollinson. Pianoforte pieces were played by Miss Alice Major, a youthful performer, and pupil of Mr. W. W. Windle, of Belper, who conducted, and contributed pianoforte and organ solos, including a March of his own composition.

Plymouth.—The "Minnesingers" gave their first public Concert on the 16th ult., in the Guildhall. A well-selected miscellaneous programme was excellently rendered. The solo vocalists were Madame Wilson-Osman, Mrs. Jolly, Mr. E. Morgan, and Mr. Montague Worlock. Mr. John Pardew won rapturous applause for his violin solo, and Mr. J. Hele, Mus. Bac. (Borough Organist), exhibited his skill on the organ in a composition by Wély. There was a full orchestra, assisted by members of the Royal Marine Band. Mr. Pardew conducted. The room was crowded, and the proceeds of the Concert will be devoted to founding a "Post Office bed" in the South Devon and East Cornwall Hospital.

Rossendale.—On Wednesday evening, the 9th ult., an Organ Recital was given by Mr. J. E. W. Lord, in the Wesleyan Chapel. A well selected programme was admirably rendered. The vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt, R.A.M., and Miss Marianne Tomlinson.

St. Helens, Lancashire.—A numerous and enthusiastic audience assembled at the Town Hall, on Monday evening, the 14th ult., to hear, for the first time in St. Helens, a performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah by the local Philharmonic Society. The principal vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Janet Russell, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. The members of the Society formed the chorus, and the band of thirty performers was led by Mr. S. Pycroft, of Mr. C. Hallé's orchestra; the performance being under the direction of Mr. J. T. Elliott, the Society's Conductor. The Concert was a complete success, the performance being regarded as the most important musical event that has taken place here.

Speen.—Handel's Messiah was given with much success at the Baptist Chapel, on the 9th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Loosley, Miss E. Loosley, Miss Adby, Mr. Weston, and Mr. Tottle, all of whom were highly efficient. The choruses were excellently rendered, and mention must be made of the effective cornet obbligato to "The trumpet shall sound," by Mr. Youens. Mr. Weston conducted.

Torquay.—On the 9th ult. a Lecture, entitled "The Harpsichord and Pianoforte Composers of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries," was given in the Institute, Fleet Street, by Mr. Orlando A. Mansfield, F.C.O. Selections from the works of Kuhnau, Scarlatti, Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven were rendered upon the pianoforte by Mrs. O. A. Mansfield (Mdlle. Jutz), of the Conservatoire, Geneva. The Rev. J. Dawson, B.A., Vicar of Trinity Church, presided.

Tunbridge Wells.—The Vocal Association gave an excellent performance of Stainer's St. Mary Magdalen and Mendelssohn's Athalie, on the 28th ult. In the first named work the principal vocalists were Miss Emily Armfield, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. T. Kempton, who gave a very satisfactory account of the solos entrusted to them. In the Athalie music the two ladies named were joined by Miss Punton and Miss Everest, the words of the poem being recited with much effect by Mr. Charles Fry. The orchestral accompaniments were played by the band of the Royal Engineers (leader, Mr. F. C. Hunnibell), Mr. John Cheshire's services being retained for the harp music. The choruses were efficiently rendered by the members of the Association, under the direction of Mr. N. E. Irons.

Warrington.—On Wednesday, the 16th ult., the Musical Society gave Judas Maccabæus, under Dr. Hiles's direction, the performances of both band and choir being admirable. The principals were the Misses Marshall-Ward, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Whittaker. The Society has just completed its fifty-first season.

Whitby.—On Monday evening, the 21st ult., Shinn's Sacred Cantata Judah's Captivity and Restoration, with a selection of solos and choruses from the works of Handel and Mozart, were rendered by the Brunswick Wesleyan Choir of fifty voices. Mr. Rennison conducted, and Miss Little presided at the organ. The artists were Mrs. Hill, the Misses Falkingbridge, Misses Harrison, Bingant, and Wattam, and Messrs. Frith, Stamp, and Bingant. The Rev. Jos. Little read the connective portions in a very effective manner. A silver collection was taken at the close on behalf of the Sunday School funds.

Wick, N.B.—A Concert was given on Thursday, the 10th ult., in the Temperance Hall, by the members of the Select Sacred Choir. Dr. Stainer's Cantata The Daughter of Jairus occupied the first part of the programme, the principal soloists being Mrs. G. M. Geddes, Mrs. Fergusson, Messrs. J. Davidson and W. Corner. The choruses were sung with great spirit and precision, "Awake, thou that sleepest" especially being very favourably received. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. Mrs. Geddes gained an encore for her rendering of Topliff's song "Remember now thy Creator"; and Mrs. Fergusson gave Pinsuti's "Raft" with much feeling, and was well received. Mr. Sydney Townshend conducted, and the accompaniments were played on the American organ by Mrs. R. S. W. Leith, and on the pianoforte by Miss D. Miller.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. W. T. Winkworth, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Barnabas Parish Church, Queen Camel, Bath.—Mr. Keaton Bailey, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church of St. John, Ryde, Isle of Wight.—Mr. Frederick A. CONCONE'S LESSONS

WITH MARKS OF

EXPRESSION & PHRASING

BY

Price One Shilling and Sixpence each.

50 Lessons for the Medium part of the Voice.

40 Lessons for Contralto.

40 Lessons for Bass or Baritone.

The sterling value and great usefulness of Concone's Lessons have been so long recognised and so generally admitted, that their extensive adoption caused, as a natural consequence, the issue of numerous editions in almost every country where the study of the Art of Singing is cultivated. No edition, however, which has hitherto come under my notice, seems to me as correct, complete, and reliable as it should be.

I have endeavoured to rectify this deficiency by adding in the present edition signs of expression and phrasing, where I considered it expedient to do so, completing, and in some cases altering, the breathing marks, and altogether carefully revising the whole work.

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

GRAND CHORAL MARCH

(Soli and Chorus, S.A.T.B.) 8vo, price 4d.

By WILLIAM J. YOUNG,
Composer of Popular Part-Songs.

God's blessing on our Sovereign rest,
And on her subjects free;
May Queen and country both be blest
This year of Jubilee!

On history's page no fairer name,
No purer life appears,
What age can match in deeds or fame
Victoria's fifty years?

Not civil strife nor foreign foes
May vex her life with cares,
Whilst in her joys, as in her woes,
A grateful nation shares.

Look, Lord, in mercy on our land,
Pardon, and save, and heal;
Guide us by Thy sustaining hand,
And still Thy love reveal.

Her faithful people all rejoice:
Her broadened empire cries;
Till echoed by the great world's voice,
The pæan rends the skies.

T. B. LEIGH.

The Leeds Mercury says: "An excellent specimen of a Choral Festival Anthem, is bright and jubilant in style, very melodious and easy throughout. It well deserves the attention of Choirmasters."

The Church Times says: "A jubilant composition, full of spirit, and a most successful treatment of the words."

To be sung at

The Carmarthen Church Choral Union Festival.

London: Novello, Ewer and Co.

VOCAL SCORE. TWENTY-SIXTH THOUSAND.

THE HOLY CITY

A SACRED CANTATA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"To show the great popularity of Mr. Gaul's Cantata, 'The Holy City,' it may be mentioned that the rendering at Saltley Mission Hall, on Friday last, was the fortieth in Birmingham and its immediate environs since its production."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

"The work is an honour to English art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill, but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"'The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; ditto, paper boards, 3s.; ditto, scarlet cloth, 4s.; Voice parts, for the use of Choral Societies, each 1s. A Selection of Soprano and Contralto Movements for School Use, 1s. 3d. Band Parts on Loan. Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.

London: Novello, Ewer and Co.

VOCAL SCORE. OLD NOTATION. TENTH THOUSAND

RUTH

Words by Edward Oxenford

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work, like the 'Holy City,' is full of beautiful orchestral passages, while the vocal score abounds with charming numbers."—Bucks Herald.

"'Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. . . . The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject."—Bradford Observer.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

"'Ruth' has been set to music by several composers; none, however, has become so worthily popular as the Cantata under notice. . . . It contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."—South Wilts Express.

PERFORMED IN THE TOWN HALL, BIRMINGHAM, ON SEVEN OCCASIONS.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s.; ditto, paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 4s. The Choruses (only) in Vocal Score, for Musical Societies, paper cover, 1s.

THE PRAYER-BOOK PSALTER. Pointed for Chanting, and with Chants adapted thereto, or specially composed for this Work. By Sir Herbert Oakeley, M.A., Mus. Doc., LL.D., Professor of Music at the University of Edinburgh, and Composer to Her Majesty in Scotland.

"We commend the work to the notice of Choirmasters as containing many useful hints."—Musical Times.

"A most excellent and scholarly work; we shall be surprised if it does not gain the foremost rank among psalters. It is, on the whole, one of the very best ever produced."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

"Sir Herbert Oakeley's suggestive preface deserves careful attention from all students and directors of church music. His pointing shows how carefully he has handled that great problem of Psalmody. The original and the selected chants form a repertory of music which will be greatly prized by all choirs and congregations."—London Quarterly Review.

"Dear Sir Herbert,—We introduced your Psalter on Sunday last, having given the whole school, first in section, and then collectively, some practice in it. The idea was taken up enthusiastically, and the effect was really very fine. It was truly congregational chanting. Very truly yours, J. M. Wilson, Head Master of Clifton College."

"We are convinced that (especially for such a service as ours) your Psalter is vastly superior to any other in existence."—Assistant Masters of Cheltenham College.

MUSICAL BIOGRAPHY

JOSEPH BENNETT.

NOW READY

PROSPECTUS.

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in The Musical Times, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended. The original purpose was a limited one—namely, to throw light upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Hence the series had for first title "The Great Composers, sketched by themselves."

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notices were received, it was determined to extend their scope, and, while making prominent the Masters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biographical form, as far as allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The words "sketched by themselves" were therefore dropped from the title.

It was further resolved to make additions in the case of the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices separately as "Primers of Musical Biography."

The intention of "Novello's Primers of Musical Biography" is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted.

For the copious extracts made from letters, &c., throughout the series, no apology is offered. They are the best material upon which to base an estimate of character.

This work is clearly printed (with an independent stave for the pedals throughout) upon 251 full music-size pages of the usual organ oblong form, and in one edition only, viz., the three separate parts.

The subscription is for either part, or for all, as follows:—

Part I.	10s. 6d. net, post-free.
Part II.	5s. 3d. ,, ,,
Part III.	7s. 6d. ,, ,,
Or the Complete Work	21s. 0d. ,, ,,

When the subscription list is closed, the work will only be obtainable from the publishers at the full marked net price.

The majority of the pieces are of rather an easy nature, intricate combinations of the manual and pedal parts being carefully avoided, and, in order to facilitate playing, fingering and pedal-marks are plentifully given.

This makes the thirty-six Short and Easy Voluntaries particularly useful to young students, and for teaching purposes, as the master is spared considerable trouble in making guiding-marks for a pupil, and the latter will be less likely to go astray when practising alone.

It is hoped that the Twenty-two Marches will supply an acknowledged want of a set of concluding Voluntaries for Divine Service that will not make unreasonable demands upon the player, and yet at the same time will be fairly solid and effective.

The whole work is mostly set for organs of two manuals; for, though the third manual is not forgotten, it is borne in mind that most instruments in this country have two manuals only, and that, while pieces written for two manuals can always be played upon one having three, those written for three cannot so easily be played upon two, for which, indeed, they require adaptation and re-arrangement, thus giving an organist something else to manage in addition to the execution of the piece.

It is generally acknowledged that close printing makes the reading of music a more difficult task than when it is more clearly spread out. By allowing the music ample space upon the plates this is obviated in the present work.

The first five Lists of Subscribers were published in The Musical Times for October last and following months, and the seventh List will be issued shortly. Subscriptions should be sent at once (quoting church appointment, if any) to the Composer, BURLINGTON VILLA, UNDERHILL ROAD, LORDSHIP LANE, S.E., as the List is now closing.

FOURTH EDITION.

THE SHIPWRECK

BIRMINGHAM PRIZE GLEE

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

MORNING.

'Tis morn, and the gallant bark bounds free,
In the joyous gale o'er a sunlit sea:
And the waves, as they merrily waft her along,
Welcome her onward with dance and song.
But a black cloud looms from the western sky,
And tells as it scuds of a tempest nigh,
And the sea-eagle screams as he flaps in the shrouds,
Like a warning voice from the bursting clouds.

THE STORM.

It comes! the storm! the shrieking, shattering storm,
With the thunder's crash and the lightning's flash,
'Mid the yawning skies and the wild waves' dash!
See yonder, that form—'tis the fiend of the storm!
How he whirls the good ship in the might of his wrath,
To the gulf where the foam surges white in his path!
And a wild cry rings thro' the tempest shrill,
As she sinks in the billows, and all is still.

EVENING.

'Tis eve on the waters:—an ocean of light
Bares its breast to the moon, rising gentle and bright;
And the stars, as they beam on the silvery main,
On the calm of its depths are all mirror'd again.
Ah, list! o'er the deep doth a melody sweep,
Now the storm fiend hath flown, and the waves are asleep;
Ah, list! o'er the grave of the true and the brave!
'Tis the mermaiden singing her dirge on the wave.

Price Fourpence.

The gratuitous loan of Band Parts can be had from the Composer, as also an arrangement of the Orchestral Parts as Pianoforte Duet, for use when a Band is not available.

IMPORTANT TO ALL TEACHERS OF SINGING!!

THE SIMPLEST and EASIEST METHOD of Learning to SING AT SIGHT from the STAFF is the LETTER-NOTE SYSTEM.

Select List of Publications:—

ELEMENTARY SINGING MASTER, a complete course of Instruction on the Method. 80 pp., Cloth, 1s. 6d.; paper, 1s.

ELEMENTARY SINGING SCHOOL; being the Songs and Exercises of the above Work published separately for the use of Pupils. In two parts, price 3d. each, in wrapper. In this Work the letters are gradually withdrawn, training the Pupils to dispense with their aid.

THE INTERMEDIATE SIGHT-SINGER, and the ADVANCED SIGHT-SINGER, complete and systematic works of intermediate instruction. The music is in four-part harmony and short score, forming an accompaniment if required, but is so arranged that it can be sung in two parts by omitting tenor and bass. This arrangement in itself is of great advantage, as it adapts the works for Schools as well as Choral Societies and Evening Classes. In two parts of 16 pp., price 3d. each, in wrapper.

FOR GOVERNMENT, NATIONAL, AND BOARD SCHOOLS. The Letter-Note Method has obtained Government recognition, and Letter-Note pupils are entitled to have the Sol-fa initials appended to the sight-singing test supplied by the School Inspector.

THE CODE SINGER, for the use of the different divisions in singing under the New Code.—1st and 2nd divisions, 3d. each, or in penny numbers; 3rd and 4th divisions, 4d. each, or in penny numbers.

WORKS by F. DAVENPORT, Professor of Harmony and Composition at the Royal Academy of Music. Published under the Authority of the Committee of the Royal Academy of Music.

ELEMENTS OF MUSIC. Crown 8vo, 1s.

"In the space of some fifty pages the reader will find all that is necessary to be known about the pitch of notes, intervals, and scales, rests, time, and abbreviations, and will, we doubt not, also find how much there is of which he was ignorant concerning these subjects, although he had already flattered himself that he had mastered their elements a long time ago."—Saturday Review.

ELEMENTS OF HARMONY AND COUNTERPOINT. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

This work is intended to meet a growing demand for a more concise and simpler exposition of the Day theory. It includes as much of the science of Counterpoint as is necessary for students who enter for the Royal Academy, Local, and other similar examinations.

"THE GOLDEN LEGEND" IN BERLIN.

So many fragmentary and varying reports have got into circulation regarding the adventures of "The Golden Legend" in Berlin, that it may be well, in the cause of truth, to tell the whole story as plainly and consecutively as possible. Its chief interest, we may at once allow, arises from the attitude of the Germans towards an English composer and English music. On this matter we shall have a word or two to say in the proper place.

The performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's work in the German capital was brought about by Dr. Carlotta, a gentleman well known in the literary and artistic circles of Berlin. Dr. Carlotta had long been an admirer of our composer. An excellent English scholar, he had enjoyed to the full the Gilbert-Sullivan operas, and had supported the enterprise which took the "Mikado" to Germany. Naturally, therefore, he felt much interest in "The Golden Legend," desiring that it also should be heard by his countrymen. During a visit to England last winter, Dr. Carlotta suggested that a performance of the work should be given in Berlin, under his own management. To this, of course, there could be no possible objection on Sir Arthur Sullivan's part. The composer was gratified by so practical a compliment, and cheerfully undertook to further the project by every means in his power.

Some correspondence followed Dr. Carlotta's return to Berlin, principally with regard to the engagement of Madame Albani and Mr. Edward Lloyd for the principal parts. The composer naturally desired that the help of these eminent artists should be extended to his music in its foreign venture, but for some reason or other, nothing came of the suggestion, and the names of the two English singers dropped out of the matter altogether. Meanwhile Dr. Carlotta was busy enough in Berlin. He himself prepared a German version of the book; an adequate chorus (the Sternsche Vereinschor) and the Philharmonic orchestra were engaged, and so much interest made in high quarters—where Sir Arthur Sullivan had staunch friends—that the use of the Royal Opera-house and the advantage of all its resources—principal singers, &c.—were granted. Not only so, but, by august desire, the time of performance was made to fall within the week of the Imperial birthday festivities. The most brilliant good fortune thus seemed in store for the English musician and his piece; but in the extraordinary degree of it lay a certain amount of danger. There was an obvious risk of offending native susceptibilities in exact proportion to the measure of unusual favour enjoyed by the foreign visitor. Moreover, some previous circumstances tended to increase this risk. German jealousy had been much excited by what was thought an unfair preference of English painters in the award of honours connected with the Art Exhibition. This again was connected with the strong English feeling which our Princess Royal keeps alive in her German home, not altogether to the satisfaction of her adopted countrymen. A variety of circumstances thus combined to neutralise any advantage likely to result from the particular favour enjoyed by Sir Arthur Sullivan and his work.

As soon as all arrangements had been made, and it appeared that there was a disposition in high quarters to make the performance of "The Golden Legend" a special event, the composer could do no less than agree to visit Berlin, and superintend the work done. In due time, therefore, Sir Arthur Sullivan made the long journey from the sunny, though unstable, Mediterranean shore to the cold and cheerless German capital; doing so in full confidence that, for the credit of German executive art on a conspicuous occasion, the most perfect preparations had been made to do justice to the music. At once his troubles began. No rooms had been engaged for him, and the hotels were crowded to the doors by visitors for the birthday festivities. At last, however, our composer secured—it was fortunate that he had a long purse—a suite of those gorgeous apartments which nearly all large German hotels keep up for the princes and princelets of the country, when their highnesses and serenities deign to travel. Installed amid an impressive splendour of upholstery, the English musician began to investigate the conditions of the forthcoming performances. He learned from Dr. Carlotta that the principal singers were those of the Court Opera, that the band and chorus were all right, and the prospects of the two representations as roseate as could be desired. Whereupon, Sullivan slept in peace.

Work began with the following morning. Our composer first went through "The Golden Legend" with the bass, Krolop, and the tenor, Rothmühl. They were evidently safe, and no anxiety disturbed the Englishman's calm confidence in the appointed order of things. Madame Lammert, the contralto, then passed in review. She was less satisfactory than the men, but no very serious fault could be found. On the next day, Sir Arthur presented himself at the apartments of his prima donna, Pattini, a charming person of amiable manners and pleasant address. The two went to the pianoforte and laboured through the music of Elsie with a fair measure of good results. It was evident that the young lady, with her small voice and inexperience of such work, could not give complete satisfaction, but no reason appeared for serious mistrust of the result. Another private rehearsal with Pattini took place the following day, and then came the full rehearsal, in which, if at all, the strange musician from foreign parts would enlist the sympathy of those upon whom depended the fate of "The Golden Legend" in Berlin. Sir Arthur was at once upon good terms with his orchestra and chorus. His genial speeches and manner conquered their good will, and from first to last their hearty co-operation never failed. This fact, coupled with adequate ability on the part of voices and instruments, was some set off against the depression caused by an evident lack of similar feelings in other quarters. Although no indication of active hostility appeared, there was a want of sympathy more than sufficient to jar upon sensitive nerves. Our composer may possibly have been made to feel that he was an intruder. There are many ways of accomplishing that end without effecting a breach in good manners.

The rehearsal passed off fairly well. Chinese gongs, it is true, were a poor substitute for the bells used in England, and Miss Pattini, who, having a slight cold, sang mezza-voce throughout, was a little uncertain about her points. But another private rehearsal with her would doubtless set matters right, and no anxiety arose. Then came the great night. The opera house presented a brilliant spectacle; the palace turned out a strong array of highnesses, imperial and royal, and something of the air of a State function was given to the occasion. Sir Arthur took his place, and the performance began with the clanging of the gongs. For some time all went well, but as soon as Elsie came on the scene there was an end of hope. From the first phrase to the last Miss Pattini sang hardly a bar with correctness. Not only was she out of tune, but apparently unable to give the notes their right value. It became impossible, therefore, to accompany her, and in the well known passage for voice and English horn, "My Redeemer and my Lord," the conductor signalled the instrumental performer to stop. The agony of that ordeal to our composer may be imagined. He had to stand there and see his work ruined by incompetence not less complete than startling. No escape could be made, and the performance dragged on to the end of what must have seemed interminable length. The audience suffered also, but were quick to mark their approval of certain numbers by way of consoling the unfortunate composer. "Slowly, slowly up the wall" was one of the pieces thus well received, and the Evening Hymn drew forth sustained applause, though not sung with the effective attention to nuance which obtains in England. The Berlin chorus marched through their work like soldiers, steadily, firmly, mechanically. At the close of the performance, the conductor-composer met Count Hochberg, Intendant of the Royal Theatres —Von Bülow's Count Hochberg—and his words to him—"This is ghastly!"—could have no more than faintly expressed an overwhelming feeling. Then arose a question of the final Concert. Miss Pattini could not be thought of a second time. She was manifestly impossible. What was to be done? While the Intendant and the composer were thinking out this matter, a soprano—Miss Beeth—came up, and Hochberg suggested that she should take the part of Elsie. The lady in question being an artist of acknowledged ability, Sir Arthur Sullivan saw a chance of escape from a desperate strait, and preferred his request, no doubt with the hesitation becoming a man who seeks to impose a heavy task upon an unprepared singer. Miss Beeth shrank from the sudden offer, but could not well refuse, since her Intendant backed it up. In fine, she accepted the part; but then it became necessary to postpone the performance in order to give time for study. It turned out that the theatre was available on the following Saturday, and for that night the second Concert was fixed.

Still Sir Arthur Sullivan did not feel happy. He dreaded the outcome of what, after all, was an experiment with the new soprano, who, at best, could only study her music superficially in the time available. Excited by contemplation of another fiasco, our composer resolved upon a bold stroke: he would telegraph to Madame Albani, who was at Antwerp, and beg her assistance. The wires carried the message, and, after a time of bitter suspense, brought back a reply:—Albani would come, and could reach Berlin on Friday. Saved! The distressed English musician felt a relief quite as great as that which Bunyan's Pilgrim experienced when the burden fell off his back. Sir Arthur at once sought out Miss Beeth, and explained to her the important reasons which had led him to secure Madame Albani. But there was no need for apologies. The lady seemed heartily glad to escape from a position into which she went reluctantly, and a very pleasant interview ended with good will upon both sides. Now another difficulty arose. The chorus agreed, in the kindest manner, to sing again on the Saturday night, but on enquiry after the orchestra, Sir Arthur found, to his dismay, that they were engaged for a Concert to be given by some virtuoso. Now almost worried to death, our composer called in Mr. Wolff, the well-known agent, who succeeded in clearing away the obstacle by persuading the virtuoso to give his Concert on some other night. Sir Arthur is under a great obligation to the gentleman in question for so kindly putting himself to this inconvenience, and showing the true brotherly spirit of a fellow-artist. As for the soloists, Lammert, Rothmühl, and Krolop, they were simply commanded to repeat their former service, and no trouble arose in connection with them. Madame Albani arrived in Berlin at the time appointed—she sang in Antwerp on the Thursday evening—and, at last, all was safe for the second Concert.

Concerning the performance on this occasion there need not be much said. Madame Albani did her very best; the other principals, the chorus, and the orchestra were in like sympathetic mood; the audience showed marked satisfaction with the music, and the good ship "Golden Legend," after much buffeting with angry waters, rode safely in port. But not quite unmolested, for the press opened fire with remarkable viciousness and unanimity. Indeed, the agreement of the Berlin critics proved too much. It is barely possible for a number of men, partisans of various musical sects, and having individual tastes, to think alike about a work to which their attention is simultaneously directed. The chances of such a result may, at any rate, be set down as a "neglectable quantity" in any calculation beforehand. Yet, curiously enough, the Berlin critics were of one mind in condemning a cantata as to which the enthusiastic admiration of English musicians and amateurs raises a presumption of merit. True the critics did not "damn" "The Golden Legend" with equal volubility and emphasis. Some did so by means of faint praise, but the majority were fiercely hostile, and all showed more or less of the jealousy to which the Börsen Zeitung gave voice with Bismarckian directness when it exclaimed, "Was macht dieser Fremde hier?" The Börsen Zeitung is a blundering tactician. It let the cat out of the bag in sight of all men, and gave a key to the mysterious unison of its contemporaries. "What business has this foreigner here?" The writer, and his more artful fellows, may rest assured that the words will be remembered in time to come, and perhaps find a troublesome echo on the banks of the Thames.

We have no present space for quotations from the German papers now before us, and must ask our readers to wait awhile for an opportunity of becoming more closely acquainted with the leaders of Berlin musical opinion. Enough for the present that one of their chief arguments is based upon the improbability of the author of the "Mikado" achieving success in the loftier region of dramatic cantata; and that we can see between the lines, sometimes in the lines themselves, a lofty contempt for English art. Wrapped up in their self-sufficiency, unconscious of the fact that their country is falling behind in the race for musical honours, and wholly ignorant of the immense progress made by England in recent years, these writers are living in a Fool's Paradise, and behaving to match.

Sir Arthur Sullivan was not the only man attacked, nor was his music the only thing abused. The title-page of the German version described the work as "nach der gleichnamigen Dichtung Longfellow's aus dem englischen Texte Joseph Bennett's, Deutsch bearbeitet von Dr. C. Carlotta." This, of course, was partially misleading, because Mr. Bennett did not write a single word of the English text, his task being simply one of arrangement and adaptation. Some of the wise men of Berlin were taken in by the error in statement, and viciously girded at the poor, innocent adaptor, punishing him for sins which are Longfellow's, if sins they be. They seemed to regard the changes made in the original legend by the American poet as another example of English impertinence, and were particularly hurt because Lucifer "exhibited" alcohol to Prince Henry. Their susceptibleness on this point is curious and much more difficult to understand than the apparent belief of some of them that Longfellow wrote in one language and Mr. Bennett in another.

We have now laid the whole story before our readers, who will draw their own conclusions from it, and, probably, consider the fact proved that English music has no chance in Germany while the present state of irritation and jealousy continues. We pronounce no opinion as to the rumour, originated in Berlin itself, that the critics met together before "The Golden Legend" was performed, and agreed to act in the spirit of the Börsen Zeitung: "What business has this foreigner here?" What with personal discourtesy and national animus, the case is bad enough apart from any such aggravation.

CARL ROSA AND ENGLISH OPERA.

The name of Mr. Carl Rosa has been so long associated in the public mind with the performance of opera in English, that his opinions and views upon the subject are entitled to attention and consideration. For many years past he has been at the head of an operatic company consisting of various artists, English, German, and American. He has presented many operas, English, French, German, Italian, and so forth in the "native speech of this our island." He has placed upon the stage versions of operas by foreign composers, and has commissioned rising English writers to produce works suitable for his company. These, if they have not all been successful, at all events lead the public to believe that he is thoroughly in earnest in his endeavours to establish the best possible substitute for a national opera. He has been strenuously supported by the press as well as by the public. He has had to struggle against the most adverse circumstances, but he has bravely surmounted many difficulties, has smoothed down prejudices, and has won a position which entitles his sentiments on the subject of English Opera to be received with respectful attention. His opinions have been well known to his friends for a long period, but the public has little or nothing to do with a man's opinions so long as they are restricted to private declarations. When they are expressed publicly another face is put upon the matter. They may then be sifted and examined as publicly, and their true value may be assessed. In the April number of an excellent new serial, "Murray's Magazine," issued by the world-famous publisher whose name it bears, Mr. Carl Rosa has written an article on "English Opera." Coming from so eminent an authority, the article possesses greater importance than that which might be gathered from its literary character.

Mr. Rosa confesses at the outset that the words "English Opera" look strange. "If in Paris," he says, "a Frenchman were heard speaking of going to the French Opera, or in Germany to the German Opera, or in Italy to the Italian Opera, would he not be thought eccentric? But here, in England, it is found necessary to specify opera sung in the language of the country as English Opera; where, on the other hand, till very lately, when Italian Opera was prosperous, people spoke about going to 'the Opera,' it not being found necessary to particularise it as Italian Opera." The reason is not far to seek. Englishmen are tenacious of customs and definitions. Italian Opera was the first established as a form of entertainment in this country. Therefore it was "the Opera." Performances in French, German, and English following later, required to be designated according to their several qualifications. Mr. Carl Rosa, in his article, comforts his readers, however, by assuring them that notwithstanding the strangeness of the look of the words, and the eccentricity which would be associated with the similar expression when it was employed by a foreigner, "England does not stand alone amongst countries where opera, sung in the vernacular, has had to fight a battle against opera." He further expresses his intention in his paper "to show why this Cinderella in musical art has occupied this ignominious position so long," and what justifies him "in supposing the Prince of the fable is fast approaching to raise her to that position which she is entitled to occupy."

In pursuit of this design, he at once proceeds to state his opinions concerning subventions. He thinks that the English Parliament would never subsidise a national theatre, because, as he affirms, of the puritanism still existing in the country, which would "raise forces enough to rebel" at any attempt to deal with the public funds after this manner; and he refers to one of the leading Liberal papers of the North, which has had, as he says, only two notices of theatrical performances "since its creation over a hundred years ago," as a proof that puritanical notions may influence a journal in its views concerning art, and consequently all its readers. He nevertheless implies that a State subvention would be acceptable even when he asks, and replies to his own question, as follows:—

"But is subvention from the State essential to put opera on a firm and financially sound basis? I think not. In subventioned theatres the manager is handicapped to a certain extent. In Paris he is obliged to produce a certain number of original French works every season; and as you cannot satisfactorily buy new works by the yard, the result of these productions is not always an advantage to art. He is also restricted to a prescribed class of répertoire, out of which he must not venture. He has to pay enormous taxes, amongst which the 'Droit des Pauvres' is the most formidable; and, above all, he has to take into account the wishes and influence of many, headed by 'Monsieur le Ministre des Beaux Arts,' &c."

On the other side it may be asked—Are there no compensating privileges to set off against the "enormous taxes," and the deference to the wishes and influence of many? A manager has a large amount of power in directing the current of popular taste, and of ministering to pleasures which have, or ought to have, a high artistic aim. The principle implied in the existence of the subvention is to be found in the encouragement to art which it is supposed to foster. The impresario is selected, in the majority of continental theatres, less with the prospect of helping him to acquire a fortune, than as the medium for the discovery and encouragement of talent. If his own judgment is good, he will have no trouble in finding the best and most promising among the aspirants for fame within the scope of his requirements. The profits arising from the successful exercise of judgment will follow as a matter of course. There may be hampering conditions associated with the subvention, but these are known, and, of course, are willingly accepted. They have the effect of holding the manager in reasonable check, for often, if left to himself, he can make or mar the success of a work he has found it worth his while to produce. Mr. Rosa thinks that, although the restrictions in France are bad, "Italy is in an even worse position. Though the municipalities give a grant to the theatres, varying according to the importance of the towns, the manager is the absolute tool of everybody. The towns do not only appoint a committee to look after their general interests, which would be quite fair, but separate committees for each different department. There is a committee for the scenery, a committee for the dresses, a committee for the ballet, and so on. Above all, there is the Editore (the music publisher). He is the prime factor with whom managers have to reckon. He dictates which work shall be performed, and which shall not; he ordains which artists shall be engaged, and which shall not; and with all these masters to serve, the impresario has only one duty to perform, and that is to pay—or not to pay—the piper; and he mostly does the latter! In fact, no one who values his independence would accept such a position." The action of the publisher in Italy with regard to art, may be undesirable according to Mr. Rosa's views, but it may be necessary according to the state of things in the "land of song." The question is whether matters of art could be improved, if the manager were allowed to occupy a position in England equivalent to that of the publisher in Italy. It is more consistent with reason to assume that the composer would be in better case when he has the publisher to look after his interest in preference to the manager. The interests of the composer should be the chief consideration after the interests of the public have been satisfied. The existence of the subvention would seem to secure these ends sooner than they could be obtained at the hands of a private manager. Mr. Rosa disposes of the question of State or municipal subvention without approaching the subject in a satisfactory way. He is a manager, and, therefore, looks at the matter from the point of view occupied by his position. From the public side another aspect appears. The universal admission of the advantages of the subvention in places on the Continent, does not arise from an amiable eccentricity on the part of foreign states and cities. The practice has been retained through many varieties of political and social opinions, and it must therefore be held as valid because it must be felt to be good. It could possibly be proved to be so in many ways, the chief of which would doubtless be found in the advantage it places in the hands of the public in controlling the prejudices and the vagaries of a manager, and compelling him to labour for art as well as for his pocket.

Mr. Rosa thinks that a more healthy state of things exists in Germany, though "everywhere a certain baneful control from the powers above is felt, but still not enough to jeopardise the artistic result." "With all that," he says, "I think Germany, as far as opera is concerned, is not progressing either in creative or executive power."

This is his conclusion after saying that:—

"The German loves opera. Opera in Germany occupies the same position among national amusements as sport does in this country. There you will as often hear a new tenor spoken of in clubs, restaurants, and railway trains, as here the horse on which the odds are laid for the Derby. But it is more than an amusement; it is considered as a part of musical education. A German will go to hear a new work more than once, if beyond his conception the first time. An Englishman, once bored, will with difficulty be made to return; and this is the reason why light opera, opera bouffe, and burlesque have the advantage in this country. They are so easy to digest after dinner."

Apart from the assumed difference in their love for opera among the two nations, it should be remembered that the prices in a German theatre are very small, in an English theatre very large. A German can hear five or six performances from a comfortable seat, for the same amount which an Englishman is expected to pay for one. A lover of music of either nation will not grudge having spent two shillings for a bad performance, and will not be much hindered by the cost, if he desires to patronise the theatre in the hope of hearing something better next time. If he has to pay half-a-guinea for a single visit, he hesitates before making a second venture. So long as the theatre is considered as a place of amusement, amusing things will be preferred to dull entertainments. A few only may be attracted by what they consider to be a sense of duty, to favour things which are affirmed to belong to the domain of high art; but the general public will only give their support to matters in which they feel an interest. The existence of the subvention, to a certain extent, secures to the public, through the medium of the impresario, the quality of mental pabulum required. Where the subvention does not exist, the manager is, in duty bound, obliged to exhibit some deference to the wishes of his subscribers. If he has no such support, and depends entirely upon the public, it is his business to ascertain the drift of the public mind, and to act accordingly. A manager may be clever enough to steer clear of the influences which are for ever surrounding him, influences which may cause him to swerve from his duty to the public, and to pursue his own course heedless of the advice and counsel ever at his command, with or without the asking. Under the principle of the subvention, it appears, he has to submit to this sort of official, and unofficial, interference.

Mr. Rosa thinks that the means to build up an establishment of National Opera are ready in England. The chorus at a Leeds Festival, he affirms, proves the existence of the raw material. The temptations offered by the chances of making success as ballad singers deter young artists from studying for the stage. There is, unfortunately, no special Training School for Operatic or Dramatic Art in England. The recent attempts at operatic performances made by the pupils of the Royal College of Music and the Royal Academy, show that some thought has been given to this "part of the student's education at our musical institutions," but the experiment requires to be frequently repeated in order to produce satisfying results. Instrumentalists are in abundance, audiences are ready, and there are composers enough to provide a nucleus of original works under proper encouragement. The establishment of English opera as an institution must be made, like other British institutions, of small beginnings, perseveringly maintained. If all the previous efforts to establish English opera had been continuous, each one an improvement upon the other, there would be a different tale to tell this day. If a subvention had been granted in England, we might have had a National Opera long ago. Opera, as it exists in France and other countries, working with the highest artistic aims, would not live without State or some other extraneous aid. If the question "Will it pay?" has always to be considered, the elevation of art and the fulfilment of more exalted aspirations is not possible. It has been a misfortune for music in England that opera has been almost always in the hands of one manager for the whole country. Monopoly is always bad for art. Mr. Rosa, when he calls English opera the Cinderella of musical art, is not without reason on his side. It has been a drudge among entertainments. The most careless of country managers would never think of presenting any dramatic work after the manner in which many an opera has been placed upon the stage in England. An army of four, a chorus of six, a band of eight, eked out with furtive accompaniments on the harmonium and pianoforte, with other disadvantages, are not the means whereby art can be elevated, and opera as an entertainment be made greatly in demand. The fact that such exhibitions have been well patronised is a proof of the love of the British public for this form of art-work. Mr. Rosa's great success has been due to the excellence of his artists, and the care generally taken with his productions. If opera can be made successful as a private venture, Mr. Rosa thinks there are good grounds for the hope of a permanent establishment of National Opera, concerning which he declares himself to be "inclined to take a sanguine view":—

"I do not admit National Opera to mean opera by British composers alone. No country in the world carries out this theory. In France, Meyerbeer, Weber, Mozart, Rossini, Verdi, Donizetti, Gluck are admitted at the Grand Opéra. In Italy, Mozart, Wagner, Meyerbeer, Halévy, Bizet, Gounod, Massenet, Goldmark, &c., are included in the répertoire. In Germany, all nations are drawn upon, even England. Why, then, should England, which cannot yet claim (though I think the time will come when it may) a national school of composers, expect to have a répertoire exclusively of home manufacture? I think, without disparaging former efforts, that this notion as regards English Opera has been the principal rock on which the ship has foundered."

Here Mr. Rosa appears to have forgotten that every serious attempt to establish opera in London has been distinguished by the production of foreign works as well as English. The English versions of "La Sonnambula," "Fra Diavolo," "The Crown Diamonds," "Faust," and other works, were at one time more popular than those in the original tongues, because they were more frequently performed in the vernacular.

"When I made up my mind to fight the battle over again, I resolved not to depend entirely on English productions, but to give them a fair chance at every available opportunity, and I certainly think the English composers have fairly come up to the mark." Before a National Opera can be established, the "raw material" must be worked up. The great Schools of Music in England should provide opportunities for the training of singers for the lyrical stage, upon sustained principles, not spasmodic efforts. As State subvention cannot be obtained, some other means must supply the demand when it is called into being.

Mr. Rosa places his finger upon certain spots which are felt to be weak in our musical organisations, but he goes out of his way to lay a sweeping charge against the motives which influence artists. The absence of histrionic power may be supplied if it were possible to call into existence an institution where young singers can learn to rid themselves of the awkwardness of which he complains. He admits that "considering the circumstances, it cannot be said that, as a whole, an English singer is devoid of talent for the stage." But it can scarcely be considered fair or just when he affirms that "what an English singer does want, as a rule (of course there are exceptions), is more love for his art, and just a little less for his pocket." This charge is one which may or may not be applicable, but anyway it has a tinge of ingratitude, coming as it does from one for whom artists have done so much. Tu quoque is no argument, but is it not possible that the English singers may have justice on their side if they make the same charge against managers?

All through his article Mr. Rosa seems to contend that matters of art may be left to the impresario to deal with. He promises at the outset to show, if possible, some of his reasons for believing in a brighter future for English Opera. This he forgets to do. He breaks into a wealth of discursive matter instead. The would-be philosopher becomes the raconteur. He proposes but does not answer his own questions, he leaves them to be answered by others. He drops into anecdotal experiences of a manager's troubles, and gives a detailed consideration of the requirements for a successful operatic establishment. All these things are interesting, but the main question started at the outset is not approached. It may be eliminated from the series of stories of his own experiences abroad and at home, but the inexperienced reader is left in the dark as to what it is that "justifies him in supposing that the Prince of the fable is fast approaching to raise Cinderella from her ignominious position." The answer is inferentially furnished by another publication, namely, the Prospectus of "The Carl Rosa Opera Company, Limited," with a share capital of £100,000, of which 2,500 preference and 7,500 ordinary shares (£5 each) are offered for subscription. It is announced that this Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring and developing the business of an English Opera Company. "Opera in England being in the exceptional position of not having any State subvention, it is considered that the best way to place this branch of music on a permanent basis, is by establishing a Company for the purpose." The Carl Rosa Opera Company possesses the nucleus for this purpose. It is proposed to secure a fixed home for English Opera in London, and for this purpose additional capital will be raised. Mr. Carl Rosa parts with the goodwill of the business he has established after so many years' experience, and there are other matters usually suggested in all new enterprises which need not be referred to now.

The disadvantages of a State subsidised Opera may be counterbalanced by the advantages of private enterprise such as is proposed. He refers in his article in the magazine to the benefits derived from private management of large matters of public convenience, as shown in the difference between English and foreign railways, and in this way prepares the reader for the limited liability scheme.

There can be no doubt that, with all his knowledge and experience, Mr. Carl Rosa is the right man to be at the head of such an enterprise. Considering all the trouble he has taken, and the anxieties he has undergone in the endeavour to establish English Opera as a permanent institution, it must afford him the highest satisfaction to obtain so substantial a reward at the end of his labours. But, it may be asked, is a company, identified with the name of one man, likely to promote the cause of National Opera? The Company, not being likely to be subjected to the pressure made upon a private individual, may find itself free to work for the elevation of Art. In this regard it has the highest wishes for success. A corporate body of this kind should be moved to more serious activity for Art than it would be reasonable to expect in a private person, however earnest his ambition.

The public will look to the Company to offer encouragement to native art and artists, and will support the venture, and enable the Company to earn the 12 per cent. promised, if the endeavour is made not only to minister to popular taste, but to lead it by right paths to higher elevations, such as are expected to be attained by the help of State subventions or subsidisations. It remains with the Company to show by their actions, so soon as they get to work, the possibility of earning this 12 per cent., but not on those principles which are said to guide the "young English singer as a rule."

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By Joseph Bennett.

No. XXII.—GRÉTRY.

In his supplement to Fétis's "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens," Mr. Arthur Pougin writes:—"It is singular that at a time when musical history and biography have acquired so much importance, an artist like Grétry, whose influence has been so great and renown so considerable, is not the subject of a serious, profound, and exhaustive work." We quote these words as indicating a state of things which, naturally, is more marked in England than in France. It may even be that, to some of our readers, Grétry is little more than a name, while others may vaguely associate him with an opera called "Richard, Cœur de Lion," now no longer played. Our present purpose is to improve upon this, as far as the limits of a mere sketch allow. Grétry was a master who deserves to be better known. He filled a large place in the world of art during his active career, and the position he will ever hold in the story of operatic development is in itself a sufficient recommendation to studious notice.

The Belgian master's family had its origin in the village of Grétry—a little place not far from Herve, in the diocese of Liège. There it was seated for generations, and gave to Church and State men of local mark and standing. The Grétrys had a strain of music in their blood. Our composer's grandfather could form a small orchestra at any time by calling his children together, one of whom, François, ultimately followed the art as a profession, and played the violin with a certain amount of talent. In 1738 François Grétry married Marie Jeanne de Fosse, one of his pupils, a young lady of good family but small means. Marie, whose relatives opposed the match, had little or no fortune; this was her husband's case also, but the young couple, as lovers will under such circumstances, drew largely upon the bank of hope and cheerfully took upon themselves matrimonial responsibilities. The second son of this couple was born in February, 1741; some say on the 11th of that month, others on the 8th. We shall not weary the reader with documentary evidence on a matter of small present concern. It is enough to be certain that the infant, André Ernest Modeste Grétry, was baptised at the church of St. Nicholas, Liège, on February 11, 1741, and that, according to invariable usage, he could not then have been more than two or three days old.

At a very early age young Grétry showed musical sensibility; and, on one occasion, at least, childish curiosity about the origin of sound nearly had a fatal result. His mother's kettle was singing on the hearth, the boy upset it in the fire, and became enveloped in a cloud of suffocating and scalding steam, which left him, for a time, in very sorry case. Not long afterwards he joined the choir of St. Denis' Church, his trial piece being an Italian air adapted to sacred words. So well did the lad acquit himself that the Chapter gathered round in voluble admiration of his voice and skill. Young André's first music master was a veritable Solomon in one respect—he never spared the rod. It seemed, indeed, as though he sought to make up for neglecting the mind by paying extra attention to the body, which he whipped with no less ardour than frequency. Grétry refers to this person in his Memoirs: "He invented tortures wherewith to amuse himself, even making us kneel upon a short round stick, and knocking us over every time we moved. When he heard nothing but sighs and sobs he was most convinced that he had done his duty. Imagine what I suffered during four years spent in that horrible inquisition." On escaping from this continental Squeers, André passed under the authority of Simon Leclerc, who is described as a mediocre musician, but devoted to his pupils. Leclerc also ruled with a rod of iron—it was the fashion of the age—but Grétry's enthusiasm for music could not be whipped out of him by its professors. He made rapid progress, especially in reading at sight in different clefs, though it does not appear that he studied any instrument. About this time an Italian company visited Liège, playing the operas of Pergolesi and other masters of the same period; assisted by a local orchestra, wherein André's father held one of the violins. During the whole season the lad enjoyed free admission, warming up his enthusiasm with each successive performance, and becoming so ardent that, on being put under Nicolas Rennekin for harmony and counterpoint, he fretted sore against the drudgery of preliminary studies. He, forsooth, must plunge at once into motetts and fugues, orchestral symphonies and pianoforte sonatas, as though his good genius had made him independent of customary methods. Some of these works were actually performed at Liège, to the enormous delight of the young composer, and also to his benefit, since they brought him under the notice of a clerical amateur, Canon de Harlez, who suggested a course of study in Rome, then the head-quarters of European music. The worthy priest did more than this; he obtained from the College Chapter a grant for the lad's expenses and sent him on his way rejoicing. It may be that the Chapter were glad to get rid of our young musician, who had lost his boyish treble, while the rupture of a blood-vessel when straining at a high note made him risky as a vocalist in any capacity. But, from whatever motive, Grétry's spiritual pastors and masters did the right thing by him and laid the foundation of his fortunes.

Grétry was eighteen when, in the latter days of March, 1759, he set out from Liège to walk to Rome, having as his companions an Abbé, a young surgeon, and a gentleman who gained his living by evading custom-house officers—a respectable and praiseworthy profession, then held in general esteem. The party were two months on the road, and pretty well "used up" when they caught sight of the dome of St. Peter's. Bidding his fellow-travellers adieu, Grétry sought out a college founded by a Liègeois, as a home for students from his native city, with a right of residence during five years. There he took up his abode, and placed himself under Casali, preparatory to going through a regular course of instruction, almost from the rudiments upward. Casali would hear nothing of motetts, fugues, and symphonies. The flowery land where such things rightfully grow can only be reached by painful travel through the arid regions of harmony and counterpoint. This fact Grétry's master impressed upon his pupil so effectually that the young man submitted with a fairly good grace. Presently occurred an event which had much influence upon Grétry's future. In 1760, Nicolas Piccinni brought out, at Rome, his comic opera, "La Cecchina ossia la Buona Figliuola," with immense success, and the youthful Liègeois was greatly struck by Italian fanaticism for its engaging and simple melodies. It is said that, when he called upon the composer, Piccinni received him coldly, and gave much offence to his self-love, but that did not prevent Grétry from allowing himself to be influenced by the popular master's method and style. At this time the young man had made his talents so far known that the director of the Alberti theatre invited him to compose an intermezzo, "Les Vendageuses," for the Carnival. Grétry scored his first success with this piece, and was serenaded the next morning by the town drummers, only an hour or two before the Governor of Rome summoned him to the Municipal Palace to receive castigation for permitting encores without waiting for the dropped handkerchief by which that functionary or his representative signified the gubernatorial assent.

After his initial success, Grétry received offers from other Roman managers, but a resolution to visit Paris prevented their acceptance. What seems like an accident called him to the banks of the Seine. A member of the French Embassy, having given him a copy of Monsigny's "Rose et Colas," Grétry was so struck by the composer's declamation and melodic form that he determined to study at the head-quarters of Gallic art. Accordingly, after having lived nine years in Rome, he set out for Paris on the first of January, 1767, taking the Geneva route, and finding the city of Calvin attractive enough to make him halt there. For a while he lived by giving lessons in singing, but soon tiring of that occupation, he set new music to a condemned opera of Favart and Blaise, and had it performed by a French company then playing in the town. Of this, his first French work, the master wrote in his Memoirs: "It had a success which encouraged me. The public filled the house six times—a good deal for a small town like Geneva." So much was he encouraged that he addressed the following letter to Voltaire, then living hard by:—

"Monsieur: A young musician arrived from Italy, and some time settled in Geneva, would try his feeble talents upon a language which you each day enrich by your immortal productions. I vainly ask the men of spirit in our neighbourhood to come to the help of a young man full of emulation. The Muses have fled before Bellona, and, doubtless, taken refuge with you, Monsieur, and I implore your intercession with them, assured that, if you grant my prayer, they will instantly be favourable and never desert me."

Being ill at the time, Voltaire excused himself from writing a reply, and sent a verbal message to the effect that he would receive Grétry at Fernay. The young musician lost no time in availing himself of this gracious offer; making it a first duty to apologise for addressing his host without an introduction. Voltaire put the apology aside: "I was delighted with your letter, and, having heard of you, I wished to see you. You are a musician, and you have ésprit. That is so rare that I cannot but regard you with lively interest." During the rest of the year spent by Grétry in Geneva, he was often at Fernay, whose illustrious occupant finally persuaded him to start for Paris and try his luck on that greater stage.

Having settled down in the French capital, our Liègeois was more often seen at the Comédie Française than at the lyric theatres. In studying declamation, as illustrated by Clairon, Talma, and other great actors, Grétry was simply carrying out the task which Monsigny's opera had suggested to him at Rome. He believed that the nearer lyrical declamation was brought to the best models of speech, the truer and stronger it would become. Here lay his great artistic principle, from the following of which he never swerved. Meanwhile Grétry looked about for a poem to set to music, and, faute de mieux, decided on one, "Les Mariages Samnites," by an obscure amateur author. The piece having been composed, the question of performance presented another difficulty, for the removal of which Grétry sought the influence of M. l'Abbé Arnaud, the same who afterwards so conspicuously fought in the Gluck-Piccinni squabble. Arnaud introduced our young musician to the Comte de Creutz, Swedish ambassador, and he, musical fanatic as he was, promptly arranged to give "Les Mariages Samnites" a hearing in his own house. For this purpose he called in Trial, the conductor at the Opéra, who at once made up his mind that he would both obey the Count and damage Grétry. The performance, it is said, sent everybody to sleep; while, to make matters worse, the poem was rejected at the Comedie Italienne. Grétry's friends then persuaded him to adapt his piece as a grand opéra, but the month's labour this cost him was as good as thrown away, owing to the machinations of the French artists. On returning home, after a disastrous rehearsal at the Swedish Embassy, Grétry found an anonymous letter, which exposed the whole plot. It said: "You fancy, honest man of Liège, that you will figure among the great ones of this capital. Disabuse yourself, mon cher; go home to your compatriots and let them hear your uncouth music, in which there is neither sense nor reason." In the midst of all this Grétry was not without his consolations, and the result of a commission entrusted to him by Voltaire must have brought a sardonic delight. He was charged by the sage of Fernay to lay before the managers of the Comédie Italienne two libretti, "Le Baron d'Otrante" and "Les Deux Tonneaux." These were Voltaire's own, but the fact was not to be revealed, and the directors saw in them only the productions of a young provincial poet. As such they adjudged them to be pretty fair; needing some alterations, but, on the whole, indicating the author as a man of whom something might be made. With a view to make something of him, the directors requested Grétry to bring his young friend up from the country. All this was duly reported to Voltaire, who greatly enjoyed the fun.

On reviewing his Parisian experience, as far as it had gone, Grétry made up his mind to quit France. He was disgusted with the intrigues and miserable jealousies of the capital. He would flee away, and from them, at any rate, be at rest. But the Swedish ambassador intervened in favour of another trial. This time he sent Grétry to Marmontel with a letter, saying: "Here is a young man in despair, and on the point of drowning himself, if you will not save him. He only wants the book of an opéra-comique to make his fortune in Paris. He comes from Italy. The unhappy young fellow is without resources; he begs me to recommend him to you." Marmontel behaved very well in the matter, and shortly afterwards sent Grétry a two-act piece, "Le Huron," which was quickly set to music, and produced on August 20, 1768. Its success, immediate and great, once more put the composer in good heart. "If I ever passed a pleasant night," he wrote in his Memoirs, "it was the one which followed that happy day. My father (who died some weeks before) appeared to me in a dream; he held out his arms; I rushed towards him uttering a cry which dissipated the sweet vision. Dear author of my being, how sad for me to think that thou canst not rejoice in my first success." "Le Huron" took the public fairly by surprise. The composer, having been announced as Gretri, was regarded as an Italian, and the gossips said "Now we are going to have roulades and points d'orgue without end." What was their astonishment at hearing sober and naïve melodies, marked by original forms and perfect adaptation of sound to sense! They came to mock and remained to applaud. "At last," writes a biographer (Gregoir), "Grétry was saved. Marmontel, censured yesterday for associating himself with a stranger, is praised to-day. Yesterday Grétry could induce only one poet to write for him; to-day all are at his service. See how the world gives an example of fraternity. Yesterday actors and artists laughed at the Belgian composer; to-day all Paris dwells upon his talent." Grétry's name even appeared on the sign-boards of shops.

One enthusiastic, or wary, tobacconist, living near the theatre, painted over his door: "Au Grand Huron. N——, Marchand de Tabac," and simple-hearted Grétry bought a pound of his wares for luck. Voltaire duly heard of his young friend's success, while the journals of the day busied themselves in discussing his talent. A writer in the Journal Litteraire said: "A man has come very superior to those by his marvellous art of making much out of little; that is to say, of obtaining great effects through very simple means. He is M. Grétry, the Pergolesi of our day. Young though he be, he appears to hold the secret of nature. At the first stage of his career he has gained his end, his first work, 'Le Huron,' being a masterpiece. For himself, it is to be feared that, pursued by envy, burning with a thirst for glory, and being sufficiently well received for his reputation, though too little for our pleasure, he will perish in the flower of his age. His enthusiasm is such that he cannot compose without a violent access of fever; then, dominated by the god of harmony, his imagination exalts itself, he yields to its transports, and reproduces the fabulous scenes of the ancient pythoness. It is not astonishing that his works reflect the warmth of his own feeling, and, in their turn, subdue and ravish all those who hear them."

Baron Grimm—the same who was afterwards mixed up with Mozart during his stay in Paris—wrote of Grétry in a similar strain:—

"This M. Grétry is a young man who has here made his first essay, but his first essay is the chef d'œuvr of a master, and places the author in the front rank. In all France, only Philidor can measure himself against Grétry, and preserve place and reputation. Grétry's style is pure Italian. Philidor's is somewhat German, and on all points less chastened. He attracts often by force and vigour; Grétry by a manner more soft, seductive, and voluptuous."

Thus successful beyond question, and with his position firmly established, Grétry began to think of marriage, and, with marriage, justice to a confiding woman. In 1768 he had taken into his house, without the benediction of the Church, a certain Jeanne Marie Grandon, daughter of a Lyons painter, who was master of the celebrated Greuze. "She was alone," writes a biographer (M. Jal), "without a father, and with a mother living 120 leagues from Paris. Why and how came she to be alone? and to whom was she confided? I know not, but what woman will throw the first stone at this sinner? A priest took pity on her, on them, and wrote to the imprudent mother demanding her consent to a marriage, which the lovers desired, and circumstances made necessary. At first the angry parent refused; but the poor girl was so afflicted, the couple were so interesting, and the proposed son-in-law had so good a future in prospect that, at last, she consented. The marriage had, however, to be postponed in consequence of Grétry's state of health, and did not take place till 1771. In the interval a daughter was born, and baptised as Andriette Marie Jeanne. The wedding was celebrated on July 3, in the year just-named, and consummated a union which, risky in its beginnings, proved one of unalloyed happiness. All this time the master was going from success to success. His second work, "Lucile," pleased Paris as much as did his first. A critic said of it: "Grétry, by his natural melody, by his happy adaptation of music to words, had the power to thrill the heart of the masses, and excite in the spectators tender emotions and agreeable sensations. What a pity that there are not more like him to-day! for most modern writers sacrifice charm to learned structure." "Le Tableau Parlant" followed "Lucile." "Le Tableau Parlant" was Grétry's answer to those who accused him of making the Opéra Comique audience weep, and denied to him the power of being gay. "Le Tableau Parlant" is a laugh from beginning to end, and the product of a merry time, since the author assures us that during the two months of its composition, in 1769, singing and laughing were his constant occupations. It is claimed for these early works of our master that they gave the Opéra Comique a new development. Thus M. Thurner, in his Les Transformations de l'Opéra Comique:—"Soon it (Opéra Comique) will submit to a prodigious change. Under the influence of a vigorous genius, it will penetrate more than ever into the human heart; it will speak the language of love; it will become in truth dramatic. A child of Flanders, nourished upon the works of Scarlatti, Pergolesi, Buranello, &c., was the author of that revolution which prolongs its influence down to our own time." "Sylvain" and "Le Deserteur" were other works of this happy period; after them coming "Les Deux Avares," "L'Amitié a l'Epreuve" (1770), and "Zémire et Azor" (1771), the most fortunate of the series, for reasons which the master himself exposed in his Memoirs: "I had just returned to life, and nature was new to me when I began that work. A fairy tale then agreed best with my situation. The opera engaged my attention during the winter of 1770: I had nearly a constant delight in working at it because I felt that it was at once a true and strong utterance; it even appeared to me difficult to bring together more of truth, expression, melody, and harmony. It was translated into nearly all languages." Dr. Burney heard "Zémire et Azor" at Brussels in 1772, and wrote of its music:—"The music of this opera is, in general, admirable; the overture is spirited and full of effects; the ritornels and other pieces of symphony are full of new ideas and imagery; now and then, indeed, with the assistance of the singing, the airs bordered too much on the old style of French music. However, the melody is more frequently Italian than French, and the accompaniments are both rich, ingenious, and transparent, if I may be allowed the expression, by which I mean that the air is not suffocated, but can be distinctly heard through them."

Beethoven was never married, and it has often been assumed, in consideration of his apparently harsh and rugged nature, that he was never in love. That is a conclusion to which the premises do not really point. Harsh and rugged natures are often most capable of the deepest feeling, and subject to the most powerful passions. In South America you will find mountains whose tops are adamantine rock and eternal snow, but within whose recesses burn fierce and everlasting fires. So it often is with natures like that of Beethoven. Outwardly they appear to have no capacity for warm and tender emotions, whereas, inwardly, they experience those emotions in a degree unknown to the man whose sentiment oozes out at every pore. Ferdinand Ries tells us that the great composer was very often in love, though his attachments did not last long. He adds: "One day, when I was rallying him on the conquest of a fair lady, he confessed to me that this one had enthralled him longer and more powerfully than any—that is to say, full seven months." This may only imply a susceptibility to female charms, and it is pretty certain that when Beethoven really did fall in love, he remained faithful to the end, though the desire of his heart was never accomplished. After his death, copies of three letters were found in his desk, and became the property of Schindler. They were addressed to a noble lady named Giulietta Guicciardi, particulars concerning whom Beethoven's friend and biographer did not consider himself at liberty to reveal. It has been contended, as in the famous case of Mrs. Harris, that there was no such lady at all as the one these letters point out; but, whatever Schindler may have been, he would scarcely tell a deliberate lie in saying that Beethoven sometimes commissioned him to make enquiries about her in after life; nor, indeed, was the master the sort of man to emulate Mr. Toots, and indite epistles to imaginary persons. The letters referred to are a curious mixture of the philosophic and the rhapsodical. From the tenor of the first it appears that the lady had expressed impatience either at her lover's absence, or, perhaps, at his want of decision. How do you suppose he advised her to console herself? Let his own words answer. "Why this deep grief when necessity compels? Can our love exist without sacrifices? Can you alter the fact that you are not wholly mine nor I wholly yours? Ah, contemplate the beauties of Nature, and reconcile yourself to the inevitable! Continue to be my true and only love, as I am yours. The gods must ordain what is further to be and shall be." Beethoven's method of treating the lady's impatience was certainly peculiar, and it is curious to note how, with a half-pagan philosophy, the master advises his beloved one to seek comfort in the beauties of Nature. Few young ladies, I take it, would see the force of this. When in pouting mood they can understand soothing words and endearing protestations, but a recommendation to take a walk in the fields and learn contentment from the serenity of Nature would hardly have a calming effect. To Beethoven the counsel was perfectly natural. Amid rural sights and sounds he forgot all his troubles. There is a good deal of philosophy in the second letter, but also a good deal of love. Listen to this suitor of more than forty years: "Ah! where I am there you are ever with me. How earnestly shall I strive to pass my life with you, and what a life will it be! However dearly you may love me, I love you more fondly still. Oh, heavens, so near and yet so far! Is not our love a truly celestial mansion, firm as the vault of heaven itself?" Hear him in the third letter also. After invoking Giulietta as his "Immortal Beloved," he goes on: "I must live either wholly with you or not at all. Indeed, I have resolved to wander far from you till the moment arrives when I can fly into your arms and feel that they are my home, and send forth my soul in unison with yours into the realm of spirits. Alas! it must be so. You will take courage, for you know my fidelity. Never can another possess my heart—never, never. Oh, heavens! why must I fly from her I so fondly love? Continue to love me. Yesterday, to-day, what longings for you! what tears for you! for you! for you! my life! my all! Farewell! Oh, love me for ever, and never doubt the faithful heart of your lover. Ever thine! Ever mine! Ever each others!"

Well, nothing came of all this. The affair, beyond the evidence of the letters, is shrouded in mystery, and, though Beethoven in after years made no secret of his anxiety for the lady's welfare, he remained, in all other respects, as silent as the grave.

There is evidence to show that the well-known Bettina von Arnim, Goethe's sprightly friend, inspired him with a sincere affection. She came to Vienna when unmarried, called on Beethoven, and fairly made him the captive of her bow and spear. The master's letters show this. In one he says: "Never was there a lovelier spring than this year; I say so, and feel it too, because it was then I first knew you. I was at once conscious that you came from a better sphere than this absurd world where, with the best inclinations, I cannot open my ears." Clever Bettina charmed the master by talking about art. "Dearest girl," he wrote, "Art! who comprehends it! with whom can I discuss this mighty goddess! How precious to me were the days when we talked together, or rather, I should say, corresponded. I have carefully preserved the little notes, with your clever, charming, most charming answers." Like a young lover he then proceeds to lament that no angel met him in his lonely walks, and that he would gladly bury his head in a sack since, outside the sack, there was no longer a prospect of beholding her. Bettina loved to tame elderly lions like Goethe and Beethoven, but she had no idea of marrying an untidy, passionate deaf man, getting on towards fifty. When her intended union with Von Arnim was announced, Beethoven wrote to her, saying: "May all the felicity that marriage ever brought to husband and wife attend you. What can I say of myself? I can only exclaim with Johanna 'Compassionate my fate. Now farewell my dear, dear friend. I imprint a sorrowful kiss on your forehead, thus impressing my thoughts on it as with a seal." Bettina, with a woman's instinct, could not have mistaken the purport of all this, and she must have been filled with compassion for the lonely master, whose great and warm affections, shut up in himself, were helping to burn his life away. After the lady's marriage he again addressed her in touching words. Referring to Goethe, he said, "Heavens! if I could have lived with you as he did, believe me I should have produced far greater things. A musician is also a poet; he, too, can feel himself transported into a brighter world by a pair of fine eyes, where loftier spirits sport with him and impose a heavier task upon him. What thoughts rushed into my mind when I first saw you! The most beautiful themes stole from your eyes into my heart, which shall yet enchant the world when Beethoven no longer directs. Spirits may love one another and I shall ever woo yours. Farewell, dear one; your letter lay all night near my heart and cheered me. Musicians permit themselves great license. Heavens, how I love you! Your most faithful friend and deaf brother, Beethoven."

Schindler says "It cannot admit of a doubt that if Beethoven had had the good fortune to meet with a lady of like condition with himself, whom he could have called his own and who had thoroughly known and loved him—this, with his eminent qualities for domestic life, would have proved the foundation of his happiness." Beethoven had the same opinion. He yearned for intimate communion with some kindred soul, and once wrote on a scrap of paper, "Love, and love alone, is capable of giving thee a happier life. O God, let me at length find her—her who may strengthen me in virtue; who may lawfully be mine." But all these longings were vain. He was destined to live on in the immense solitude of his genius, and made miserable by contact with a world which he could not understand, even as it could not understand him. For ourselves we have no reason to complain. In the case of poets and musicians, the fairest flowers spring up after the storms of tribulation. In some respects, it may be said of them:—

> The sorrows which the soul endures,
> Not self-inflicted, are but hooded joys,
> That when she touches the white strand of heaven
> They cluster round her and slip off their robes,
> And laugh out angels in the world of light.

Nevertheless, we look on the lonely Beethoven with sadness, for nothing in his history is more pathetic than the contrast of what might have been with what was. No wonder that he exclaimed against his lot, that he said hard words of life, the world, and fate, or that, when in the agony of death, he grimly muttered, "Applaud, friends, the comedy is ended."

RELIGION AND POLITICS.

On his death-bed, Beethoven received the last rites of the Roman Catholic Church, but his membership of that body was never more than nominal. Strictly speaking he belonged to no church, subscribed to no creed, and made no profession of formal religion. Yet he was a religious man—religious in the uprightness and purity of his life, in his hatred of wrong, and in the high tone of his moral nature. These are qualities which most reasonable men regard as far more essential than profession of faith in a system of theology. He believed in God, and kept always on his desk a definition of His being and attributes, very brief but very comprehensive:—

"I am that which is."

"I am all that is, that was, and that shall be."

"He is alone by himself, and to Him alone do all things owe their being."

Beethoven was religious, it is clear, in the sense that Plato and Socrates were religious, but with feebler light than shone upon those great souls. In this capacity he rarely spoke of himself, and it is significant that on looking at Moscheles' arrangement of "Fidelio," and seeing it subscribed "Fine, with God's help," he wrote underneath "O man, help thyself." In all his letters and papers, but one direct reference to the Bible appears. Addressing a friend he said "This is Friday, and I will give you something out of the Gospel—'Love one another.'" The famous letter to his brothers, written in 1802, contains another suggestive passage: "God looks into my heart, He searches it and knows that love for man and feelings of benevolence have their abode there." But when, in the same document, he speaks of having meditated suicide, in consequence of approaching deafness, his words might have been uttered by a philosophic pagan: "Such things brought me to the verge of desperation and well nigh caused me to put an end to my life. Art, art alone, deterred me. Ah! how could I possibly quit the world before bringing forth all that I felt it was my vocation to produce? And thus I spared this miserable life—so utterly miserable that any sudden change may reduce me at any moment from my best condition into my worst. It is decreed that I must now choose Patience for my guide. This I have done. I hope the resolve will not fail me steadfastly to persevere till it may please the inexorable Fates to cut the thread of my life. My wish is that you may enjoy a happier life, and one more free from care than mine has been. Recommend Virtue to your children; that alone, and not wealth, can ensure happiness. I speak from experience. It was Virtue alone which sustained me in my misery. I have to thank her and Art for not having ended my life by suicide. Farewell. Love one another." These may be the words of a pagan, but some of them are not unsuggestive of the essence of Christianity.

In politics, Beethoven was distinctly a Republican. He made no secret of it; but his republicanism was that of the philosopher who goes apart from the world and dreams of an ideal state of society rather than that of one who seeks to propagate a political faith. His noble nature revolted against the domination of might over right, and hated the miserable shams before which men were expected to bow down. So he turned from the actual world to the ideal state set forth in Plato's "Republic," and there found satisfaction for his intellect and balm for his feelings. When the figure of the great Napoleon emerged from the red ruin of the French Revolution, Beethoven hailed him as the deliverer of oppressed humanity—the political Messiah come to establish the reign of social righteousness. With this view of the illustrious Corsican, he composed the Symphony in E flat, and called it "Napoleon Bonaparte." Everybody knows how great were his rage and disappointment when the First Consul put the crown of empire on his head. "He is no better than the rest! Here is a tyrant the more!" exclaimed the wrathful master, as he tore the cover from the Symphony and threw it away. He did not speak evil of dignities, nor, as such, did he hold them in reverence. In one letter he says: "I write nothing about our monarchs and monarchies, for the newspapers give you every information on this subject. The intellectual realm is the most precious in my eyes, and far above all temporal and spiritual monarchies." Again, addressing Bettina von Arnim, he observes: "Kings and princes can indeed create professors and privy councillors, and confer titles and decorations, but they cannot make great men—spirits that soar above the base turmoil of this world. There their powers fail, and this it is that forces them to respect us. When two persons like Goethe and myself meet, these grandees cannot fail to perceive what such as we consider great." Then he goes on to tell how he and the author of "Faust" once met the Imperial family of Austria on the promenade. As soon as the Majesties and Highnesses were observed approaching, Goethe, with the instinct of a courtier, stood aside. "Come on," said Beethoven; but the poet refused to move. "I," writes the composer, "pressed down my hat more firmly on my head, buttoned up my great coat, and crossing my arms behind me, I made my way through the thickest part of the crowd. Princes and courtiers formed a lane for me; Archduke Rudolph took off his hat, and the Empress bowed to me first. These great ones of the earth know me. To my infinite amusement, I saw the procession defile past Goethe, who stood aside with his hat off, bowing profoundly. I afterwards took him sharply to task for this; I gave him no quarter, and upbraided him with all his sins." Yet the man who thus asserted the rank given him by nature stood on friendly terms with the highest of the Austrian nobility, and even with princes of the Imperial house. "It is good," he said, "to be with the aristocracy, but one must be able to impress them." That Beethoven did impress them is clear. Sir George Grove writes: "It was not men alone who were attracted by him; he was an equal favourite with the ladies of the Court. The Princess Lichnowsky watched over him like a mother. The Countesses Gallenberg and Erdödy, the Princess Odescalchi, the Baroness Ertmann, the sisters of the Count of Brunswick, and many more of the reigning beauties of Vienna adored him, and would bear any rudeness from him. These young ladies went to his lodgings, or received him at their palaces as it suited him. He would storm at the least inattention during their lessons, and would tear up the music and throw it about. He may have used the snuffers as a toothpick in Madame Ertmann's drawing-room, but when she lost her child he was admitted to console her, and when Mendelssohn saw her fifteen years later she doted on his memory, and recalled the smallest traits of his character and behaviour." Thus did one of the proudest aristocracies in the world virtually admit the rank of a man who, though of humble birth, was ennobled by that purest of all fountains of honour—Mother Nature. Contact with princes and lords never spoiled Beethoven. In him there was nothing whatever having the smallest affinity with the snob. Happily, for when the aristocracy of Vienna left it to strangers and foreigners to cheer his last days, he had nothing wherewith to reproach himself.

No attempt to reach the inner nature of Beethoven can succeed without duly estimating the influence upon his outward life of the terrible calamity of deafness. One cannot read his letters without being convinced that here lay the secret of his great unhappiness, and of the morbid feelings which made him more and more shrink from contact with the world. When the malady first declared itself, the master was overwhelmed, but, with natural sensitiveness, he kept the fact a secret from all save his friend, Pastor Amenda, at whose hands he sought consolation.

When breaking the news to another friend, he said:—

"I can declare with truth that my life is very wretched; for nearly two years past I have avoided all society, because I find it impossible to say to people I am deaf. In any other profession this might be more tolerable, but in mine such a condition is truly frightful. I often can scarcely hear a person if speaking low; I can distinguish the tones but not the words, and yet I feel it intolerable if any one shouts to me. Heaven alone knows how it is to end. How often have I cursed my existence. Plutarch led me to resignation. I shall strive, if possible, to set fate at defiance, although there must be moments in my life when I am the most unhappy of God's creatures."

As regards the nature of his mental suffering, take the picture drawn in the quotation just made. Beethoven is fast becoming the "lion" of Viennese art-circles. Men and women are eager for his notice. To converse with him is an honour. But when they speak he turns upon them eyes full of an expression not understood, and his lips remain closed. "How absent he is," they whisper, and turn away. Absent! Ah! if it could only be known how keenly he is present, and how, made conscious anew of his great trial, he, like another Job, is cursing the day wherein he was born. Who can gauge the anguish of such a man in moments like these? It belongs to himself alone, "and a stranger meddleth not therewith."

Wail after wail rises from the pages of Beethoven's letters on this terrible subject, but I must be satisfied to quote his words when all hope had fled, and the poor deaf musician knew the worst. Writing from a village near Vienna, he said: "The fond hope I brought with me here of being to a certain extent cured, now utterly forsakes me. As autumn leaves fall and wither, so are my hopes blighted. Almost as I came I depart. Even the lofty courage that so animated me in the beautiful days of summer is gone for ever. O Providence, grant me one day of pure felicity. How long have I been estranged from the gladness of true joy? When, O my God, when shall I again feel it in the temple of nature and of man? Never! Ah! that is too hard."

Here, undoubtedly, we have the secret of much that seems strange and even repulsive in Beethoven's character. The sensitiveness that led him to conceal his infirmity as long as possible, made him in after life shrink from the presence of strangers, and tended to embitter his relations with the world. Adding to this the ever-present consciousness of a genius but partly understood, and the fact that when the gay and brilliant Rossini appeared in Vienna with his enchanting melodies, society ran after him and turned its back on the infinitely greater master—putting all these things together, we have enough to account for the strange, wilful, moody, irritable Beethoven, whom we all know.

Yet a nobler and, at the same time, more tender nature never existed. His capacity for loving was immense, and the affection he lavished upon the unworthy scapegrace his nephew gives proof of the fact. Nothing that the youth did—and he did much—could alienate his uncle's love. Beethoven's letters to him overflow with tender solicitude and infinite long-suffering. In one place he writes, "Now farewell, my darling; deserve this name. I embrace you, and hope you will ever be my good, studious, noble son." Again he says, "Be good and honest. Be my own dear precious son, and imitate my virtues, but not my faults; still, though man is frail, do not have worse defects than those of your sincere and fondly-attached father." Not seldom uncle and nephew had quarrels, caused by the stupid and wicked behaviour of the younger man. On one occasion, Carl stayed away a long time, and appears to have worked upon his uncle's feelings by threatening some rash act. Then Beethoven wrote, "Say no more; only come to my arms; not one harsh word shall you hear. For God's sake do not bring misery on your own head. You shall be received as lovingly as ever. I pledge you my word of honour you shall meet with no reproaches from me. You need expect only the most affectionate care and assistance. Only come. Come to the faithful heart of your father. For God's sake come home to-day, for we cannot tell what risks you run. Hasten to me." Again he writes: "So I am to see you on Saturday. Write to say whether you come early or in the evening, that I may hasten to meet you. I embrace and kiss you a thousand times over—not my lost but my new-born son. Live, and my care of the son I have found again will show only love on the part of your father." Reading the extracts just quoted—there are hundreds like them—we have no difficulty in recognising the sentiments of a deep and tender nature. It is hard indeed to associate them with the stern, morose, and well-nigh "impossible" Beethoven, into whose presence men ventured with fear and trembling. But here, I make bold to think, we have the true man revealed. And a grand man he is, animated alike by noble regard for truth and honour, and not less noble purity and strength of affection. We may regret that he lavished his love upon an unworthy object—that the wealth of feeling squandered upon a heartless youth was not possessed by some good woman who would have beautified his life. But none the less—rather all the more—must we admire the faithful devotion shown by Beethoven to his adopted son—a devotion that endured to the end, unaffected by the folly, and worse, of him whose undeserved fortune it was to possess it.

But, after all, the inner nature of Beethoven is best shown in his music. In art he lived another and a greater life than that which men saw. There he was supremely happy, ever dwelling in an enchanted Paradise, surrounded by beautiful and gracious forms, the children of his imagination. Nothing troubled him there, and he could at any moment withdraw himself from a world of envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness, from a world of doubtful friends and heartless relatives, from a purblind world which could see very little and laughed at that, to a region where all was light and joy, and within whose limits no discord ever entered. Every life has its compensations, and this was the compensation given to the poor deaf musician, against whom apparently the storms of an adverse fate raged with unceasing fierceness. In the inner sanctuary of his art he must have foreseen an artistic immortality—"a broad approach of fame and ever-ringing avenues of song." To him came with boundless consolation the picture drawn by the poet whose verses were read at his grave side on March 29, 1827:—

Forth from a rock a fountain broke, and rife
Where'er it flowed it left the seeds of life
And turned old nature into youth again;
All throng'd around the enchanted spot, to crave
A bountiful refreshment from the wave.

A few there be of deeper searching mind
Who drink delighted of that wondrous stream,
Others admire to see it gently wind,
And Sol's bright rays upon its surface gleam;
Others a common rill the fount declare,
Less marvellous than some, and far less fair.

The fountain sank! then first the giddy throng
With shame and grief its tardy homage paid;
And zealous Art, with emulative song
Poured in the praise long earned and long delayed.
Alas, no sigh, no tender plaintive lay
Can bring the vanished fountain back to-day.

Thou, lost one, from thy mortal fetters freed,
Thou wert the fountain and its power thy own;
Thine was the magic volume few could read,
And less could understand. Now thou art known,
Now every tongue its high-wrought praise would give Exulting—and thou must have died to live.

MACKENZIE'S "JUBILEE ODE."

This work, upon which Dr. Mackenzie has been engaged for some time past, is now complete, and on its way to several distant parts of the Empire, where arrangements are making to perform it in celebration of the Jubilee. Primarily, as our readers know, the Ode was intended for the Crystal Palace only, but it will be given also in Canada, Australia, Trinidad, Cape Colony, &c.; thus standing out from all its fellows as, in some sort, an Imperial work.

Without anticipating the criticism which will follow upon performance, we may here give some idea of the scope and character of the Ode. Mr. Joseph Bennett, the writer of the words, has kept strictly in view the exigencies of a musical setting. He has obviously prepared, not a short poem for readers, but one for musical hearers. Hence a variety of rhythm and structure which, otherwise, would certainly not have been ventured upon. From the same cause arises also the manner in which the subject is laid out, with a view to contrast of musical effect. We may indicate the nature of this arrangement. In the first vocal number, a chorus, the news of the Jubilee is proclaimed and its diffusion throughout the Empire called for. The second number, a tenor solo, conveys to the Queen the affectionate greetings of her home-lands, declaring that, to keep the feast with unanimity, all weapons of party warfare are laid aside. In the third number, the Colonies and Dependencies pay their homage, the idea worked out being that of a procession passing before the throne. First comes the Dominion, followed by Australia, the smaller colonies and islands, and, lastly, by India. Each of these divisions has a section of the chorus to itself. The fifth number, a soprano solo, dwells upon the personal virtues of the Sovereign, while the sixth, and last, opening with a choral prayer for the Empire, continues with lines leading to the National Anthem, for which a new second verse has been written. How far the writer has been guided by consideration for musical opportunities need not, after this outline sketch, be indicated. The spirit in which Mr. Bennett has approached his theme best appears, perhaps, in the opening verses:—

For fifty years our Queen!
Victoria! hail!
Take up the cry, glad voices,
And pass the strain
O'er hill and plain,
Peaceful hamlet, roaring city, flowing river,
Till all the land rejoices.
Wild clanging bells and thund'rous cannon
With your loudest shock the air, and make it quiver
From Dee to Tamar, Thames to Shannon.
For fifty years our Queen!
Victoria! hail!
Take up the cry, old Ocean,
And hoarsely shout
The words about—
British ships and world-wide British lands will cheer them—
Rouse an Empire's full devotion.
O blowing Wind, come hither bearing
Answering voices, loud acclaiming. Hark! we hear them.
They our loyal pride are sharing.

In setting the words to music, Dr. Mackenzie has necessarily to consider the place of performance, and the number of performers. This, however, was an amiable and fortunate obligation, since the result has been to give us a work built upon broad lines, and marked by plainness of structure to an extent unusual with the composer. We think that the music will be found to have a true festive ring, and a majestic solidity befitting the occasion. In the solos, with their more subdued expression, Dr. Mackenzie has kept contrast in view, without sacrifice of simplicity; but it is in the choruses that he best shows himself a master of bold and striking effects. Every bar goes straight to the point, while avoiding the common-places that naturally suggest themselves in the writing of festive music. The procession chorus is, in this respect, most noteworthy of all, and may be found no mean rival of that in the "Rose of Sharon."

The Editor of the Century, having gathered the opinions of many eminent American musicians on the question of international copyright, is able to use the following language: "It will be remarked that these responses, like those of the authors, recognise the pre-eminence of the ethical issue which is involved. Looking merely at the indifference of our legislators on this and other moral questions, one might think with Emerson that 'Things are in the saddle, and ride mankind,' were it not for such widespread and unsophisticated sense of right as is shown by such protests as these from authors and composers, who, we are sure, are in this matter the truest representatives of American sentiment. How long will it be before senators and members will recognise that this is primarily a moral rather than an economic question, and that the conviction of large classes of thoughtful people that we are pursuing a disgraceful policy, is a source of weakness in the national self-respect for which legislators individually are every day newly responsible." We venture to answer the question contained in the last sentence of this excellent paragraph. Senators and members will amend their ways and their laws when the business interests concerned are anxious for a change. The worship of the "almighty dollar" is still an institution in the States, and its procedure is as unscrupulous as ever. When the Century editor sends a circular to music publishers and music buyers and hears from them that the present policy is "disgraceful" an immediate reform may be looked for. Meanwhile, it is satisfactory to discover that American musicians are on the right side, as becomes men of "light and leading." We will give a few specimens of their answers to the Century query. Mr. Dudley Buck would hail an International Copyright Law "with joy." Mr. Chadwick: "Common justice demands that the artist shall have the right to the fruit of his labour." Mr. H. A. Clarke: "It would seem that the mere statement of the existence of such a state of things ought to be enough, in the name of justice and honesty, to end it, in spite of the vested interests—viz., publisher's capital, stock, &c.—that are constantly referred to as something too sacred to be meddled with." Mr. Julius Eichberg: "The absence of such a law benefits solely our music publishers; its enactment would remove one of the chief obstacles to our eventually becoming a musical nation." Mr. Floersheim: "An International Copyright Law is 'not only a matter of justice, but also a stimulus to mental activity.'" Mr. Arthur Foote: "Justice and expediency alike demand an International Copyright, and every educated person in the country should ask for it." Mr. B. J. Lang: "There is no honourable defence for our present thievish attitude." (Bravo! Mr. Lang). Mr. Louis Maas: "Every right-minded person must condemn the unprincipled piracy of literary, and, especially, musical works." Mr. Mosenthal: "Moral justice ought to be done to the right of property of the brain as well as to that of the purse." Mr. W. S. Pratt: "It is surely disgraceful that the United States is one of the last of the great powers to accept and adopt this idea." Mr. Schlesinger: "It is time that wholesale stealing of, or simply voluntary payment for, the productions of the brain should be stopped." Mr. Theodore Thomas: "The present state of the law is an inducement to swindling, and degrading to us as a nation." Is it not likewise degrading that, at this stage of the world's life, a number of respectable gentlemen should be asked to give their opinions on a moral question of the most elementary character? It is as though they were polled for or against the eighth Commandment. But, unhappily, need exists to arouse the national conscience, and now, we hope, American publishers and the public generally will abandon the "thievish attitude" of which Mr. Lang so plainly speaks in his honest resolve to "call a spade a spade."

The season of the National Opera Company in New York appears to have been very satisfactory, at any rate up to the date of the press notices now before us. We have reports about the performance of three operas—"Aïda," "Faust," and Rubinstein's "Nero," the last-named being given for the first time. All the critics substantially agree concerning the merit of the representations, and we may, perhaps, take the facts as of good augury for the establishment among our cousins of opera in the vernacular. Success with them is bound to exert an influence here. So closely are the two countries allied, that any popular movement in one finds an echo in the other. This being the case, we have a distinct interest in the present spirited attempt to develop a lyric drama, as far as circumstances will allow, on national lines. The managers seem to spare no expense. They have a fair working company of English-speaking artists, among them Mr. Candidus and Mr. Ludwig; Mr. Theodore Thomas, as Conductor, is guarantee for a fine orchestra, and each opera appears to be splendidly mounted. Rubinstein's "Nero" excited much interest, as a matter of course; but we gather from the reports—sometimes by reading between the lines—that public opinion in New York is disposed to agree with that in England as to the Russian master's talent for dramatic composition. "Nero" across the Atlantic will probably suffer the fate allotted to "Il Demonio" here, although it may be sustained for a time by the interest of novelty, and the attraction of a splendid mise-en-scène. The house was crowded on the first night, and we are gravely assured by the New York Herald that "in the parterre boxes were Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt and his wife, whose white shoulders shone to advantage in a décolleté black velvet dress she wore."

There is considerable promise about a short experimental series of Saturday Evening Concerts, announced to begin in St. James's Hall, on the 14th inst. Their projector, Mr. Collisson, has given similar entertainments in Dublin and Belfast with complete success—a fact the more remarkable because Mr. Collisson, we understand, closes his programmes to everything of the sort ad captandum vulgus. At each of the forthcoming Concerts an instrumental Trio, Quartet, or other concerted piece will be given, and with it a Sonata, and a selection of classical vocal music. Among the artists engaged are Miss Anna Lang and Mr. Papini (violin), Mr. Albert (cello), Mr. Bottesini (contrabasso), Miss Zimmermann and Mr. W. H. Collisson (piano). The vocalists include Mesdames Valleria, Mary Davies, Antoinette Trebelli, and Enriquez; Messrs. Lloyd, Guy, Santley, and Foli. If we add that a reserved seat for the three performances can be secured for half-a-guinea, enough has been said by way of recommendation. There remains to be seen how the public will take to Saturday Night Concerts. They have been tried on the point again and again, but never, as far as our knowledge goes, with satisfactory results. There is no reason why this should be, and mayhap Mr. Collisson will break the spell which has brought his predecessors to grief.

Our latest information from Gibraltar shows that the musical "services" in the Cathedral continue a prosperous career. On the 9th ult. the sacred building was crowded in every part by persons anxious to hear an excellent selection of pieces prepared by the talented organist, Mr. Digby, who himself played Wély's Offertoire in B flat and Guilmant's "Cantiléné Pastorale." Miss A. Stringer, Captain Wyon, and Mr. Gartly contributed several sacred airs, and the band of the Queen's Own Royal West Kent Regiment played Viviani's "Silver Trumpets," Rossini's "La Carita," and a selection from one of Haydn's Symphonies. The Cathedral choir (sixteen boys and twelve men) sang Barnby's "Break forth into joy" and Tours's Te Deum in F. We mention these particulars to show that the programmes at Gibraltar are drawn up in a large and liberal spirit, to promote the "greatest happiness of the greatest number." It may be added, àpropos, that the closing performance of the first series in Gloucester Cathedral was attended by an overwhelming audience, many of whom had travelled from neighbouring towns. The new Dean (Dr. Spence) has entered heartily into the spirit of his predecessor, and it is not improbable that the second series will show important developments. With regard to the movement in Norwich, we rejoice to say that the opening service, which took place on the 20th ult., was a very great success. Thousands were present, and many more were unable to obtain admission, while the behaviour of the vast congregation was perfectly reverent and becoming. The Norwich people are delighted with the result. After this fresh experience, will not other Cathedral authorities go and do likewise?

It never rains but it pours. Music is unusually well represented in the April magazines and reviews. Mr. Carl Rosa discourses, in entertaining fashion, on his experience as an impresario in Murray's, while the Century contains a symposium of American composers on International copyright in music. But it is reserved for the National Review to contribute the most startling and original paper on the art in question, under the heading of "Wanted—An English Musical Style," from the pen of Mr. Frederick J. Crowest, of which we may boldly state that the atrocity of its diction is only equalled by the atrocity of the views which the author sets forth. It does not invariably follow that because a man has ideas he has the power of expressing them fluently and well.

The case of Bishop Butler in past, and of Professor T. H. Green in recent times, will readily occur in disproof of such an assumption. But such an astonishing laxity and confusion of style as Mr. Crowest displays in the article in question betokens a corresponding poverty and confusion of thought, and suggests, as an appropriate corollary to his title, "Wanted—An English prose style, by the same author." The truest refutation in such cases is furnished by quotation. We are ruined by discipleship, says Mr. Crowest, and after expressing a desire that an earthquake or a flood might "rid us of everything that serves as style, model, foundation or what not, in our musical creations," he goes on: "The new musical coatings given to these old forms and flavourings have ever been the curse of musical progress in this country, and it is high time that such 'dishings-up' were turned away from once and for ever by the music-loving public." This is a fine tangle of confused metaphor, but it is surpassed by a sentence on the following page: "English art is not, and season after season brings with it the exasperating circumstances of hordes who sight to a nicety the barometer of English musical turn and sentiment." The picture of a horde sighting the barometer of a turn is quite equal to that of the historic rat hovering in the air, and which had to be nipped in the bud. It is really difficult to discuss a question seriously with a writer who talks such fustian. And yet Mr. Crowest is apparently in earnest in the wholesale charges which he hurls at the English public for their indiscreet patronage of foreigners. Our only chance of achieving anything is to boycott all but native musicians, brood over nothing but native scores, and resolutely avoid all contact with Continental musical influence. If we do this, all may yet be well, and an English Handel will be evolved. The parallel is unfortunate, for Handel, with his Teutonic solidity, his Italian training, and his residence in England, was about as composite a genius as the world has ever known. But Mr. Crowest's whole paper is a tissue of inconsistencies and incoherences, and we prefer to recommend it to our readers as an entertaining irritant rather than as a serious contribution to the controversial musical literature of the day.

If the intelligent foreigner had occupied himself on the recent Good Friday by making a circuit of London in order to ascertain how the common people elected to spend the solemn day, he must have come to the conclusion that listening to sacred music was by far the most favourite method of observing the occasion. Five years ago it was not so, for the simple reason that our licensing authorities, in the plenitude of their wisdom, held to the idea that it was less ungodly to pass Good Friday evening in a ginshop than in listening to the masterpieces of oratorio. The Albert Hall, possessing a royal charter, was independent of these worthies, but other public buildings were rigorously closed. We believe it was mainly due to the exertions of Mr. Ambrose Austin, aided by the protests of the press, that the ridiculous embargo was removed, and the result is a triumphant justification of the movement in favour of a change. To attempt an enumeration of the performances on the 8th ult., within four miles of Charing Cross, would necessarily end in failure. We noted fully a dozen performances of "The Messiah," and several of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Dr. Stainer's "Crucifixion," while the miscellaneous programmes in town halls, Institutes, Athenæums, School-rooms, &c., were bewildering in number. Not less remarkable was the tale of crowded audiences at all the leading entertainments. A vast number of people assembled in the Crystal Palace; nearly 7,000 entered the Albert Hall; the Albert Palace and the Japanese Village were crammed, and the three Concerts which were given at St. James's Hall were too few for the number of persons who sought to gain admission. It must be borne in mind too, that what is called "society" holds aloof from Good Friday entertainments; it was the masses who sought eagerly for musical edification, and in this fact may be found the best defence—if defence were needed—for the repeal of the former iniquitous law.

Even in such an unlikely place as the Criterion Restaurant seekers after bodily sustenance were regaled with a number of sacred selections by Mr. Richard Mackway's excellent choir of men and boys. On ordinary occasions a programme of glees and part-songs is offered, and if it be granted that the divine art is not necessarily degraded by association with the sensuous pleasures of the table, then the kind of fare provided by Mr. Mackway is preferable, on all grounds, to noisy and vulgar waltzes and cornet solos. It may even chance that some may be brought by this means within the refining influence of music, for if seed is sown broadcast some is certain to take root. There were really some points of genuine interest in the sacred Concert referred to above. For example, there was a very spirited tenor solo and chorus "Laudate pueri Dominum," by the semi-forgotten Italian composer Zingarelli, the solo part being excellently sung by Mr. Richard Evans. After all, the musical dinner is only a variation on the café Concerts in the larger German towns. In Dresden, particularly, there are several establishments where a decent orchestra plays nightly, and where the honest burghers and their families sup and drink lager beer to the accompaniment of Haydn's and Mozart's symphonies.

The unfortunate individual who asserted that whenever he served on a jury, it was his fate to be associated with "eleven obstinate men," was certainly to be pitied; for any person who, with large numbers differing from him, resolutely insists upon maintaining his own opinion, has fairly earned the right to be considered a martyr. Such a man is the musical critic of the Belfast News-Letter, who, although the whole musical world has decided that Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" is one of the greatest works of modern times, tells us, in a notice of its performance by the Belfast Philharmonic Society, that people who have sufficient taste and education to enjoy such compositions as the "Sleeping Beauty," "Mors et Vita," the "Moonlight" Sonata, &c., "cannot but feel the pretentiousness, the dulness, the gross inexpressiveness of the work which was performed last evening." Respecting the orchestration, he says that "the subtle discords and the curious combinations achieved by a daring use of several wind instruments, with the dry shriek of a reed here and there, may be pleasing to a musician who is above considering anything so commonplace as the gratification of a general audience"; but that to ordinary listeners, "these discordant sounds, though produced with undoubted ingenuity, are still nothing but discords." A little further on the writer becomes more modest, for he says "so far from there being anything in the work that one can feel, there is nothing in it that one can understand"; but this inability to comprehend the composer's meaning is shortly after contradicted by his bold assertion that the "Tui nati vulnerati" "is commonplace, and the accompaniments lead nowhere," the critic winding up with the remark, "a more unsatisfactory work we have never heard." In proof of the excessive originality of this criticism, we may say that very many correspondents have forwarded it to us with a request that we should comment upon it. The best comment, however, would be to place it side by side with the numberless laudatory notices called forth by the composition on its production; for, undoubtedly, if this profound critic is desirous of forming one of the jury to decide on the merits of a work which at once stamped the fame of Dvorák in this country, he will have to do battle with more than "eleven obstinate men."

THE Liszt Scholarship, for the institution of which, in commemoration of Liszt's visit to England last year, a sum of about eleven hundred pounds was subscribed, was competed for on the 21st ult., when the examiners, Mr. Edward Dannreuther, Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, and Professor Sir G. A. Macfarren (Chairman) adjudged Miss Grace Mary Williams Henshaw to be the best of the candidates who presented themselves; Grace Simon, Francis M. E. Hime, and Maude Wilson being named in order of merit after her. Thirty-nine candidates entered their names for competition. Of these twenty-four presented themselves for the preliminary literary examination. As two failed to pass this, there were only twenty-two competitors left for the musical examination. That such a prize, which carries with it three years' free education at the Royal Academy of Music, to be followed by two or, in extraordinary cases, three years spent abroad, should not have brought forward a larger number of competitors certainly seems surprising.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

MR. MAPLESON produced the first of his promised novelties on the 22nd ult., when Bizet's "Les Pêcheurs de Perles" was heard for the first time in England, under the more convenient name of "Leila." What space we have to spare for opera may be given to this work more profitably than to a round of performances marked neither by novelty nor excellence. The public have been treated to "Don Giovanni," "Carmen" (with Minnie Hauk), "La Traviata," "Lucia," "Marta," "La Sonnambula" (with Madame Nevada), and other familiar selections from the repertory of the house, while artists have come and gone in bewildering number and variety. There is very little satisfaction to be got from the details of such helter-skelter procedure, and we shall content ourselves with this brief reference, passing on to the one subject that legitimately excites interest.

"Leila" has come to us through Italy, where managers and public have taken it up with considerable warmth. In this the Milan La Scala showed the way, the work still remaining on the active list of that great house. Meanwhile France leaves foreign countries to exploit the operas of her gifted son, and it is curious that even "Carmen" enjoys more favour outside the composer's native country than within it. We can only say, "So much the worse for France." "Leila" is a product of Bizet's early time, and was written under circumstances which should be taken into account when judging its merits. When the composer returned from Rome, at the end of his term as Grand Prix, he formed one of a band of young musicians who had attained the same honour, but could find no proper work to do. Bizet made pianoforte transcriptions for a living, and doubtless his comrades in distress descended to like forms of hack employment. Talent was thus running to waste. Count Walewski, then Minister of Fine Arts, having had his attention drawn to the matter, took a very proper step, and offered M. Carvalho, manager of the Lyrique, an annual sum of 100,000 francs, on condition that he produced each year a three-act opera by a Prix de Rome. Carvalho agreed to the bargain, and, being always kindly disposed to Bizet, gave him the first commission resulting from it, at the same time forwarding a libretto, "Les Pêcheurs de Perles," by MM. Cormon and Carre. It does not appear that Bizet was consulted about the book. The manager alone made the choice, and we can well believe that had Bizet been allowed a right of veto, he would at once have rejected a drama which has very slight personal interest, and is, in structure, a curious example of rococo work. We shall not inflict the story in detail upon our readers. Enough that it turns upon the very natural, though rebellious, and even perjurous behaviour of a "veiled virgin," who, being employed to dwell upon a cliff and conjure away evil from the Cingalese pearl-fishers, and having taken oath not to speak of love during her term of office, is caught in the very act of sweet-hearting with a handsome hunter, whom she had met when acting as a "veiled virgin" somewhere else. The offenders are doomed to death by the pearl-fisher King, although the hunter is his friend, and Leila the idol of his heart. However, before the execution can take place, the chief repents, devises a plan to permit the escape of the captives, and himself suffers death at the hands of his enraged subjects. This melodramatic plot is worked by many used-up devices, the result being that it terribly handicaps the music, and makes the Opera impossible of permanent acceptance. The music shows its composer in the undecided state which usually precedes the direct, consistent, and individual work of a genius. Bizet's nature was one of great receptivity and active sympathy. He always had an idol, and, until he developed his own particular style, he could not help a certain degree of imitation. Hence, though there is much in "Leila" that must instantly be recognised as proceeding from the composer and no one else, there is much that can be traced to others. Considering that Bizet had spent years in Italy just before writing this work, we naturally look for the influence of Italian composers; doing so by no means in vain. Some of the unison choruses actually suggest Donizetti; but, perhaps, the influence of Verdi's later style, as we have it in "Aïda," is most evident. At one period Bizet was a thick-and-thin admirer of Verdi, whose sway over him he sometimes almost ostentatiously illustrated in his music—in "Ivan the Terrible," for example, the score of which was, for that very reason, destroyed later on by the master's own hand. Of course we do not mean to imply that "Leila" presents instances of direct imitation; Bizet's own individuality is always strong enough to stand in the way of such a result. But light is light, though tinged by the medium through which it passes, and the Italian origin of much in "Leila" is discernible through the Bizet colouring. The lyrical parts of the work are decidedly the best. In the strong dramatic situations the composer's lack of power, as regards both conception and expression, is decidedly manifest, the Finales especially being weak. For this, however, the beauty to be found elsewhere makes considerable amends. Certain of the choral numbers, as well as many for solo voices, are charming; the best of all, in our view, being a duet for tenor and baritone in the first act. Here Bizet is quite distinctive, and the result is a most engaging combination of lovely melody and well-judged treatment. Throughout the opera the orchestration commands delighted attention. It trusts more to delicacy, refinement, and contrast of colour than to mere noise, and it is satisfied to accompany and set off the vocal music instead of, by a noble but inconvenient symphonic rage, to thrust it into the background. For reasons already stated, "Leila" is not likely to keep the stage, but selections from it will always be prized by the connoisseur as gems "of purest ray serene."

The performance was fairly good, and the opera suffered nothing for want of efficient mounting, though the stage management might have been better. Chorus and orchestra did their work well; Miss Fohstrom, MM. Garulli, Lherie, and Miranda sustained the principal characters with a satisfactory measure of acceptance, and the audience, though not enthusiastic about the work, signified their pleasure with a good deal of it.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL.

THE work of the Albert Hall Choir during the month just passed does not call for lengthy record. A few words will suffice, for instance, with regard to a performance of "The Messiah" on Good Friday. The fitness of the theme to the occasion, and the regard in which the sacred Oratorio is held, combined to fill the immense house with an audience who listened reverently from first to last. The solos were sung by Miss Robertson, Miss Damian, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Watkin Mills, a group representing, some may think, the second order of executive talent, but a satisfactory one nevertheless. It is superfluous to insist that the concerted numbers were well rendered.

On the 16th ult. Mr. Barnby conducted a performance of "The Golden Legend," then given for the third time this season. Sullivan's popular work drew the usual large audience, and was heard with customary attention and pleasure, the more because of the excellent hands in which the solos were placed. Two of the artists who "created" their respective parts at Leeds again recommended the Cantata by practised talent, the Ursula of Madame Patey and the Prince Henry of Mr. E. Lloyd being admired of all admirers for a perfect combination of vocal skill and appropriate expression. On this occasion Elsie was represented by Miss Nordica, who achieved what we may, without offence, describe as an unexpected success. The clever young lady had got well hold of the character, and gave us the gentle, devoted maiden to the life. Moreover, she sang the music delightfully, enlisting the sympathies of her audience and evoking most cordial applause. Mr. Vaughan Edwardes and Mr. Watkin Mills efficiently completed the cast. With regard to the choruses, it is open to doubt whether the excellence of previous performances was quite sustained. This may have resulted from over confidence born of past successes. The growth of confidence under such circumstances should be closely watched. It sometimes causes rashness.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

At the sixth and last Concert of the season, on March 30, Gounod's Sacred Trilogy "Mors et Vita" was given, before an audience so attentive and earnest as to convey the impression that a congregation had assembled for worship in a religious building. Much interest was created by the appearance of Miss Antoinette Trebelli for the first time in London in Oratorio; and, if we may judge from her charming and sympathetic singing throughout this trying work, there can be little doubt of her attaining a high position in this important branch of the art. Not only in the solos, but in the quartets, her pure voice and refined phrasing delighted all hearers, and she was frequently and most warmly applauded. That Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley gave the utmost effect to the music with which their names are now identified need scarcely be recorded; but special praise must be awarded to the fine choir, which not only fully sustained its reputation, but added materially to the high estimate formed of its capabilities, which indeed seem unlimited when we consider the difficult works which, with but short preparation, have been so uniformly well rendered during the season. The orchestra was everything that could be desired; and Dr. Mackenzie, who conducted with his accustomed care and intelligence, received quite an ovation at the conclusion of the performance. We are glad to find that a third series of these excellent Concerts will be given next season.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

Apart from the intrinsic interest of Mr. Corder's new Suite, "Scenes from the Tempest," which was the novelty of the Saturday Concert of the 2nd ult., the circumstances of its composition afford a pleasing evidence of the genial encouragement which Mr. Manns has always held out to native composers, and the unstinted exertions bestowed by him in order to secure an irreproachable execution of their works. It is most gratifying to learn that Mr. Corder was induced to write the present Suite by his admiration for the fine performance of his "Prospero" Overture by Mr. Manns in October, 1885. It originally formed part, as we gather from the programme, of a grand ballet founded on Shakespeare's play, the serious and elaborate character of which induced the composer to abandon his scheme when half completed. Condensed and adapted for concert performance, the work is still on so large a scale, and so richly orchestrated, that its adequate presentation can only be achieved under the bâton of a first-rate conductor, and with the co-operation of a band like that of the Crystal Palace. The "scenes," while coming entirely under the category of programme music, are by no means wanting in carrure or lucidity, and the complexity of the instrumentation never interferes with the clearness of their outlines. Splendidly rendered under Mr. Manns, this clever and interesting work was very cordially received, and will, we trust, inspire its composer to add still further to a department of instrumental music for which he displays such a remarkable aptitude. Another item of interest in the programme of this Concert was Mozart's Concertante Quartet for oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, the genuineness of which, though called in question on the occasion of its performance at a recent Concert of the Philharmonic Society, is supported by the strongest internal evidence, as furnished by the music itself. The performance on this occasion, however, left much to be desired, for while Messrs. Malsch, Naldrett, and Wotton rendered their parts with unimpeachable taste and finish, Mr. Clinton gave an undue prominence to the clarinet throughout. In addition to this, the omission of several of the variations in the Finale, and other alterations in the score, are difficult to excuse. The Overture to "Masaniello" and the "Eroica" Symphony were also included in the programme, songs being contributed by Miss Antoinette Trebelli, who showed marked advance in breadth of style in Handel's "From mighty kings."

In spite of the inevitable alterations and omissions in the programme, necessitated by the indisposition of Miss Liza Lehmann and of Mr. Lockwood, who was announced to play Handel's Harp (or Organ) Concerto, the Concert of the 9th ult. was one of the very best and most enjoyable of the series. Madame Néruda's unsurpassed excellence as an interpreter of Spohr's music has often been noticed, and was never more conclusively demonstrated than by her superb performance in the Dramatic Concerto (No. 8, in A) of that master on this occasion. Later on, Madame Néruda, accompanied by her sister, gave Handel's familiar Sonata in A in charming style, and being encored, repeated the last movement to the delight of her hearers. The other orchestral numbers were Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture and Schubert's colossal C major Symphony, to the "heavenly length" of which Mr. Manns rendered the most perfect and poetic justice. It is on such occasions that the loss with which we are threatened by the present condition of the Crystal Palace is most vividly brought home to us. Miss Alice Gomes, who replaced Miss Lehmann at very short notice, met with well merited approbation for her efforts. Her voice is a singularly fine mezzo-soprano, reminding us in its pure metallic timbre of that of Madame Trebelli, and her method is excellent, though she greatly lacks animation, nor is she to be congratulated on her choice of songs.

The programme of the twentieth Concert was devoted to the works of Beethoven, including the Choral Symphony, the Choral Fantasia, and the "Leonora" Overture, No. 3, in all of which the performance of the orchestra was admirable, especially in the Scherzo of the Symphony. The efforts of the chorus, whose task was rendered easier for them by the entrusting of some of the most difficult passages to the soloists, were highly creditable, but, unfortunately, in a work of such superhuman difficulty, excellence of intention is no guarantee of success, and the inability of the soprani to reach their high notes was painful to listen to. Mr. Kwast, who was entrusted with the pianoforte solo in the Choral Fantasia, is chiefly noticeable for his refinement and charm of touch. There is nothing phenomenal about his performance, but as sound and classical playing it deserves high praise. The solo quartet consisted of Misses Annie Marriott and Annie Layton, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Frederick King.

THE POPULAR CONCERTS.

In unmusical England a feat has been achieved which, so far as we are aware, has no parallel in Germany, Italy, or France—to name the three countries which by some singular misconception of facts are considered more devoted to music than our own. In less than a generation a thousand performances of the severest kind of music have been given by one director and have yielded a handsome return, without any external aid in the way of subventions, guarantee funds, or any other artificial means of support.

It is possible, of course, for a band of enthusiasts to carry on an undertaking for an unlimited period, and in spite of public indifference, by simply bearing whatever loss may accrue; but this is not the case with the Popular Concerts. It cannot be too strongly stated that they were started as a commercial enterprise and have so continued to the present. The moral is obvious; in other countries musical art is vitalised to a large extent by the system of infusion—that is, grants from the State or municipal authorities. With us the public rallies to the support of any worthy enterprise and makes it a valuable business property. This point seems to have been overlooked in the general chorus of congratulation which has greeted Mr. Arthur Chappell, but it is really the most important if we regard the matter from a national art standpoint.
